CONGRESSIONAL RECORD,

FIFTY-SEVENTH CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION.

to kill the President, etc., he shall be punished for a term not exceeding ten years.

Mr. RAY of New York rose.

Mr. LOUD. I hope the gentleman will not interrupt me just there.

Mr. RAY of New York. That is the Senate.

Mr. LOUD. Yes. I want to say that even the other body, three or four months nearer this assassination, was not infallible. Now, what motive prompted the enaction of section 3 or section 5 I can only anticipate. If a man aids or abets another to kill the President, he must suffer imprisonment for twenty years; but if he aids or abets in writing or in printing he shall suffer only ten years. Whether that was enacted there out of deference to the great press of the country or not I can not tell. [Laughter] The man who performs the act of aiding or abetting must suffer twenty years' imprisonment; but if he happens to put it on paper, if he issues it in a daily paper and circulates it to a million men, or proclaims it from the housetops, why then he gets off with ten years. Now, great judicial minds, it seems to me, framed legislation of that character.

Mr. RAY of New York. Well, you do not mean to charge——

Mr. LOUD. Oh, I am not charging the House. I am simply taking both of these bills, Mr. Chairman, the Senate bill being now the bill under consideration.

Mr. RAY of New York. The gentleman concedes that the House committee changed that.

Mr. LOUD. Yes; I can concede there that the committee of the House was wiser than the Senate, if I may be permitted to say so.

Mr. RAY of New York. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. LOUD. And I want to say in addition that if the Judiciary Committee would wait until next winter I think they would not alone be wiser, but would have more courage and would not yield to a sentiment, now real and earnest, in pushing the enactment of some legislation that will protect the life of the President, but the means of arriving at which the best judicial minds in this House can not agree. I think if the whole Judiciary Committee here could agree absolutely that this bill would protect the life of the President I would join them and vote for the bill; but even they themselves can not agree unanimously upon a measure that will protect the life of the President.

Now, I do not suppose there is a member of the Judiciary Committee who will assume that the fear of punishment is what prevents crime. The history of all times contradicts an assumption of that kind. There is one other thing here to which I want to call the attention of the Judiciary Committee of the House. That is about our ambassadors, for whom they are so solicitous. Section 13 of course you know is not made applicable to them. It is not assumed that they are at all times and under all circumstances in the performance of their duty.

That any person who unlawfully, purposely, and knowingly kills any ambassador or minister of a foreign State or country accredited to the United States, and being therein, and while engaged—shall suffer death.

Now, if he is killed in a State, the United States courts are going to assume jurisdiction. Then arises the question as to whether the ambassador or minister was in the performance of his duty or not, and if he was not, what is the result? The defendant is acquitted, is he not? According to your interpretation, and according to your reference to the decisions of the Supreme Court, if he was not in the performance of his duty, there is at least a question whether the United States courts would have jurisdiction.

Mr. RAY of New York. May I answer that?

Mr. LOUD. Well, briefly.

Mr. RAY of New York. The Supreme Court of the United States has decided, so many times that there is no question about it, that no criminal jurisdiction was ever expressly surrendered by the States to the United States except over piracies and offenses against the law of nations. The only criminal jurisdiction that the United States Government has is to prevent infringements of and resistance to its power when it is exercising a function specially or by necessary inference conferred upon it by the Constitution.

Mr. LOUD. Yes, I understand all that; but now let us go back to this case. A foreign ambassador has been assassinated or murdered or killed in a State and the United States courts have assumed jurisdiction. The case is tried and it is demonstrated in the trial that he was not in the performance of his duty, and the defendant is acquitted. Then what? Of course, he goes back to the State. Of course the gentleman's mind is perfectly clear that the doctrine of once in jeopardy could not hold in this case.

Mr. RAY of New York. May I answer——

Mr. LOUD. I do not care whether that doctrine can hold or not. I know that the moral effect of an acquittal in a United States court would tend to prevent punishment in the State courts. Hence the effect of that section, to my mind, can result only in bad, in harm, and harm that is wholly uncalled for and wholly unnecessary.

Now, I wish to make brief reference to section 5.

Any person who, while engaged in an unlawful attempt to inflict grievous bodily harm, kills the President—

What is your punishment for him?

Mr. RAY of New York. If the injury results in the death of the President, then the criminal is imprisoned for life. If it does not result in death, then I think he is imprisoned not less than ten years.

Mr. LOUD. Not less than five.

Mr. RAY of New York. We made the distinction between that offense and the willful killing, because we preserved a distinction between a killing with deliberate and premeditated design to effect death and an assault where there was no deliberate or premeditated design to effect death.

Mr. LOUD. Well, if it was not premeditated, it would not be murder, would it?

Mr. RAY of New York. Oh, no; not murder in the first degree.

Mr. LOUD. If it were accidental it would be manslaughter. And why make reference to it? Why confound——

Mr. RAY of New York. Confound what, may I ask? Accidental killing, if not negligent, would not be criminal.

Mr. LOUD. Why put section 5 here at all?

Mr. RAY of New York. For this reason, if you will permit me: There may be a case where a criminal might desire to disable the President without desiring to kill him; because he has not been appointed postmaster, a man might want to maim the President. He might go with a knife with the intent to cut the President in the arm or to cut his wrist, but in doing that he stabs the President so he dies. Now, we thought it wise to provide against any such attack as that. There are those who say that if a criminal makes such an attack and inflicts grievous bodily harm, he should suffer death; but the committee did not agree with that. We imprison him for life, because of the lack in such a case of a deliberate and premeditated design or purpose to effect death.

Mr. LOUD. Well, I believe that section 5 can only result in harm. I believe if a man attempts the life of the President in any way, or that if as the result of any attack upon him he dies, he should suffer death as soon as possible—not because it is a punishment, but because men of that character must be taken off the face of the earth, that is all. [Applause.] Now, if you take a man of this character and put him in prison for life, he becomes in the eyes of quite a large and growing class of people in this country a martyr at whose shrine men and women morbidly worship. And for that reason mankind demands that such a man be put off the face of the earth, not as a punishment, but because he is dangerous to the community.

Now, I did not attempt to discuss this question more than ten or fifteen minutes. I knew I was wholly incompetent to discuss it from a legal standpoint. I only intended giving to this House some reasons why I could not support this measure.

I say I do not believe this measure would prevent an attack upon or in any manner prevent the assassination of the President, Vice-President, or any officer who may legally succeed him. If I did, then I would cheerfully vote for it. Men who attack a President of the United States are men with peculiar minds, and the greater you can make the crime the more apt, in my humble opinion, they are to commit it. This bill may have the effect that my friend suggested, but if you are never going to call it into effect, but just simply respond to public sentiment, I fear that this class of people, believing that this legislation was enacted in good faith, will hasten to be the first to perpetrate the crime under it, and rush to assassinate the President of the United States. I fear that that will be the result of attempting here by legislation to single out one man in the United States and make him, if possible, a greater object for assassination than ever before. These diseased minds—for they are nothing but diseased minds—will be inflamed with the desire to be the first of what they term martyrs under this law.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me one question?

Mr. LOUD. I want to get through; I am getting quite warm.

Mr. RAY of New York. Let me ask you just one question, and then I will not interrupt you again.

Mr. LOUD. It is very hard to interrupt the gentleman when he has got to his peroration, but I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. RAY of New York. The gentleman never prides himself on a peroration or anything of that kind. Now, what I wanted to ask the gentleman was this, and he need not answer it if he does not want to: Is it true that your objection to this bill is based on the ground that you believe it to be unwise to enact any legislation on the subject?

Mr. LOUD. That I will say frankly is my principal ground; but I fear, beyond that, if you enact the legislation as you propose here you will defeat the punishment by passing such laws. That is another reason. The men who should suffer the penalty of death immediately will at the best remain to confront us here for months and years through appeals to court after court, and in the determination of the legal questions here involved they may escape justice.

Now, I am free to say that I do not believe legislation of this kind can protect the life of the President. I believe the men who perform acts of this kind, as I have said before, have minds that can not be reached in this way. It is a diseased mind, as insane as any man's who inhabits an insane asylum. Perhaps not dangerous to all mankind, like some raving maniacs, yet as dangerous to mankind as half of those in insane asylums who have a desire to kill, in many instances, one particular person, and you can not reach a mind depraved like that by legislation. The greater you make the crime the more you will incite the perpetration of it.

I would like to do something, if I could, to protect the life of the President. If I could see my way, I would go as far as any man; but this can only be done absolutely through universal education, enlightenment, and purity of intellect. I might throw out a suggestion here—that we might perhaps first look to ourselves. Let us endeavor for a moment to discover one of the reasons that may have caused the assassination of President McKinley. Let us teach the people of this country to not unduly and unjustly criticise the Chief Executive of the nation.

In days gone by on the floor of this House and in another body I have heard the Chief Executive of the nation, in my opinion, unjustly criticised, and also in public press of this country, from the rostrum and from the strump, public men held up the President to the view of the people with scorn, impugning his motives, caricaturing and picturing him as grasping a crown to put upon his own brow; and throughout the length and breadth of this land, in paper after paper and from mouth to mouth, were uttered sentences having the effect upon weak minds of inculcating the thought that this country was rushing on to imperialism, and that it would be an act in behalf of civilization to strike from the earth he who was seeking to crown himself as imperial ruler of a new empire.

Now, let us think of these things. Let us, if possible, take a lesson from the assassination of President McKinley, and improve ourselves and do better in the future. Let us justly criticise the Executive officer, but do not let us hold him up to contempt. [Loud applause.]

Mr. LANHAM. I yield such time to my colleague as he may desire.

Mr. WOOTEN. Mr. Chairman, the title and ostensible objects of the proposed bill are such as to reasonably enlist the favorable attention of every member of the House, without reference to political or partisan considerations. It is avowedly aimed at the protection of the chief officers of the Federal Government, the suppression of lawless violence against the organized civilization of the Republic, and the enforcement of the law of nations for the similar protection of the representatives of foreign governments resident in the United States. These seem to be lawful and laudable objects to command the action of Congress, provided they are not already adequately and effectively secured by existing statutes, State and Federal, to say nothing of the fundamental safeguards erected in the very Constitution of the Government itself.

But, in my judgment, an examination in detail of the provisions of this bill will disclose that it is essentially one of the most unnecessary, pernicious, and revolutionary measures ever prompted by sentimentality, conceived in sensationalism, framed in ignorance, and subversive of the first principles of criminal jurisprudence, constitutional law, and republican institutions. It is a delicate and difficult task, and one that I approach with some reluctance, to discuss the bill apart from the sentiment that gave it birth and is no doubt relied upon to secure its enactment.

Everybody knows that the clamor for this character of legislation had its origin in the recent calamity of the assassination of a President of the United States by a fanatical crank who aspired to be a hero and was condemned as an "anarchist." The principal argument advanced for the passage of this bill is founded on an appeal to the universal regret of a bereaved nation robbed of an amiable and unoffending chief, and to the righteous anger of an outraged people roused to resentment by his unprovoked and cowardly murder. Aside from this feeling there is no substantial reason that can be urged in favor of the proposed law, while there are a hundred potent and practical objections that can and ought to prevail against it.

In this connection I can not forbear to express some views that may seem harsh and sound unfeeling to some gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber. The assassination of William McKinley was perhaps more universally mourned and sincerely deplored than any infliction that has ever befallen the American people. In the presence of that unmixed and unmitigated sorrow partisan feelings were suppressed, sectional lines were obliterated, and political animosities were subdued. I know that in my own home, and among a people who disavow all that he believed and practiced politically, the grief was spontaneous and sincere, and I myself considered it an honor to be permitted to pay tribute to his memory in the midst of a mourning multitude of reverent and patriotic Texans.

But since I have heard his name so often profaned in this Hall by those who profess to follow his teachings, but who shamelessly prostitute his influence to justify their own party schemes and political iniquities, I have experienced a new sorrow that a good man's memory should be so perpetually and hypocritically invoked by those to whom he transmitted few of his virtues and little of his patriotism. I have never seen or known anything so brutal, unblushing, and indecent as the way in which the Republican party seeks refuge behind the death mask of William McKinley.

No matter on what errand of political or party pillage and perfidy it may embark, at home and abroad, violating its pledges to the citizens of our own country or carrying war and rapine among alien races beyond the seas, defying the traditions of the Republic and violating its Constitution or playing sycophant at the feet of foreign potentates and emulating foreign pageantry, false to all that is historic and heroic in its past career and blind to all that is safe and sound in its future policies, the Republican party in this Congress and throughout the country seems to consider that it has furnished a full and satisfactory excuse for all its shortcomings and a valid defense of all its abuses when it can wrap the graveclothes of a murdered President around it and masquerade in the borrowed splendors of the tomb.

There has been nothing like it since the Hussites stretched the skin of John Ziska on a drum and beat their armies to battle and their enemies into rout by the rattle of the dead hero's carcass. It is shameful, revolting, and unworthy of a great and noble man's memory, and it ought to put to flight the party that so scandalously speculates on the magic of his name. For a quarter of a century this same party lived on the inherited splendor of Abraham Lincoln's patriotic service and sacrificial devotion to his country, until they had so far stultified and repudiated his noble teachings that they could no longer quote his authority; and now it seems that they are to take a new lease of life from the pilfered and prostituted vitality of McKinley's hold upon the affections and loyalty of the American people.

I solemnly protest against this un-Christian and unmanly abuse of what ought to be a sacred and reverent memory, and I trust that some better argument will be found in favor of this bill, which, in its full meaning and as a legislative precedent, is fraught with momentous and I believe disastrous import to the future policy and practice of our Government. I do not know how many of the members of the House have studied this measure in its details and in its purport as an act of penal and political regulation by the national authority—not enough of them I very much fear, for it is a much more serious and threatening departure from well-established principles of jurisprudence and of republican government than is apparent upon a slight examination. I have tried to study it carefully and conscientiously, and I can say, without reserve or qualification, that it appears to me to be wholly vicious, unwarranted, and without constitutional or reasonable sanction.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] is the author of the bill, the chairman of the committee that reported it, and he made a very elaborate if not a very convincing argument for it in the opening of this debate. His argument here was but a repetition of the views advanced by him in his two reports upon this subject, and I shall prefer to discuss his reports from the Judiciary Committee rather than his oral deliverance, as being the more condensed and carefully considered. When we come to examine these reports they disclose a very remarkable confusion of ideas, not to say an astonishing evolution of legal judgment and judicial theory. Nothing could more thoroughly demonstrate the dangerous and reckless spirit of this legislation than the absolute inconsistency and absurdity of the positions taken by the chairman of the Judiciary Committee in the conflicting reports he has filed on these bills.

I desire to call attention to the facts as shown by the RECORD. On January 30 Mr. RAY introduced a bill, being H. R. 10386, which was referred to his committee (Judiciary), entitled "A bill for the protection of the President, the suppression of crime, and for other purposes." On February 8 this bill was reported (Report No. 433) by the chairman, placed on the Calendar, and printed. On March 22 the Senate bill (No. 3653) was referred to the same committee, and on April 4 was reported (Report No. 1422) with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, the substitute being the same as the House bill reported on February 8, with a new section added as "section 13." This is the bill we are now considering.

A comparison of the original Senate bill with the bill reported to the House by the committee on February 8 will make it perfectly plain that the only substantial difference, so far as questions of constitutional powers in Congress to enact such a measure and the jurisdiction of the Federal courts to try the offenses defined against the officials sought to be protected, between the Senate and House bills is that the Senate bill seeks to punish the killing or assaulting of the officials named, as such, and without stating that the assault or killing must have occurred against them in their official capacity, while the House bill expressly provides that the offenses must have been committed on account of or during official conduct by the persons attacked. Neither the House bill nor the Senate bill as it came to the House had the "section 13" which the Judiciary Committee have added in their report on the Senate bill.

Now, it occurs readily to anyone examining these bills and reports to inquire why this new section was not contained in the original House bill. All of this proposed legislation in the House has emanated from the same man and presumably from the same mind—that of the distinguished gentleman from New York, the chairman of the great law committee of the House. He is a learned lawyer and well-nigh infallible, as he has several times informed the House, and yet he does not seem to have discovered the necessity for this thirteenth section of the bill until he came to examine and report upon the Senate bill, and by his own confession, in his last report, it is the only thing in the bill that saves it from being grossly and palpably unconstitutional. That section reads as follows:

SEC. 13. That in all prosecutions under the provisions of the first seven sections of this act it shall be presumed, until the contrary is proved, that the President of the United States, or the Vice-President of the United States, or other officer of the United States entitled by law to succeed to the Presidency, as the case may be, was, at the time of the commission of the alleged offense, engaged in the performance of his official duties. Nothing in this act contained shall be construed as an admission or declaration that there is a time when either of such officers, during the tenure of his office, is not engaged in the performance of his official duties.

Commenting upon the Senate bill, and as a reason for the addition of the above-quoted new section to the House bill which is offered as a substitute, the able chairman of the Judiciary Committee indulges in one of the most tortuous and tangled exhibitions of legal and judicial sophistry that can be found in the literature even of that committee's contributions toward making obscure questions obscurer. The report says, on page 3:

The first six sections of the Senate act are undoubtedly unconstitutional. They are unconstitutional unless it be true that the Congress of the United States has power to enact laws defining and punishing as crimes offenses against and assaults upon all officers of the United States simply because they are officers of the United States.

There is no warrant found in any decision of the courts of the United States for such a claim.

On the other hand, every decision of the Supreme Court of the United States clearly indicates that Congress has jurisdiction to enact laws punishing offenses against and assaults committed upon officers of the United States only when they are engaged in the performance of their official duties or when the assault is made because of their official character, or because of an official act done or omitted.

In support of this proposition, which nobody was ever heard to dispute in its general sense until the learned gentlemen from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS] and from Ohio [Mr. NEVIN] made such terrible inroads upon the Constitution on yesterday, citations and quotations are given from the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States that are so satisfactory that they ought to have convinced even the members of the Judiciary Committee who are now so fiercely assailing the report to which they are supposed to have agreed.

Not the least remarkable thing about this bill and this debate is the fact that no two members of the Committee on the Judiciary seem to entertain the same views as to what the bill means or what the Constitution of the United States stands for. That fact alone ought to cause the House to hesitate long before it undertakes to enact a measure into law that is so loosely drawn and of such doubtful validity that the very men who have recommended its passage are not able to agree upon its terms, its interpretation, or even that it is worth the time taken in discussing it.

Now, if the Senate bill was unconstitutional, as here stated, it was clearly because it failed to provide that the felonious offenses against the President and other named officials must occur to them while engaged in the performance of their official duties or because of their official character. The House bill as originally reported did contain that provision or qualification, and it was recommended favorably for passage by this same committee nearly four months ago. But as then recommended it contained no thirteenth section. Why has that section been now added? What sudden accession of judicial acumen and legal subtlety suggested to the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] the necessity for this remarkable addition, not only to this bill, but to the constitutional and criminal jurisprudence of the country?

He tries to give us his reasons, and I take the liberty of quoting at some length from his wonderful exposition of what he thinks ought to be the law, but which he admits can not be made the law without violating the Constitution of the United States and overturning the repeated and emphatic decisions of the Supreme Court thereon. Here is the confused statement he makes of his reason for framing the House bill differently to the Senate bill, and it will be observed that his own reasoning and citations of authority completely refute the conclusion to which he finally comes, and utterly overthrow all that was said yesterday by his colleagues on the committee, the gentlemen from Wisconsin and Ohio:

The wisdom of the insertion of the words "while he (the President) is engaged in the performance of his official duties, or because of his official character, or because of any of his official acts or omissions" has been questioned.

There is no question as to the power of Congress to define and punish the offense of unjustifiably assaulting or killing the President while engaged in the performance of his official duties, or because of his official character, or because of his official acts or omissions.

We are of the opinion that the President of the United States, from the moment his term of office commences to the moment his term ends, is engaged in the performance of his official duties necessarily; that the courts must and would so hold as a matter of law because of the powers vested in and duties imposed upon him. But very many wise men and leading lawyers think otherwise. They say that should the President go into the State of New York, of which State he is a citizen, on private business, that while actively engaged in the transaction of that private business he would not be and could not be engaged in the performance of his official duties.

They say that should a burglar, ignorant of the presence of the President and ignorant of his identity and official character, enter the chamber occupied by the President at night when so in New York on such private business, for the purpose of committing a larceny, and encounter him and meet resistance in attempting to escape, and in overcoming that resistance kill the President, it could not be said he was killed while engaged in the performance of his official duties.

Clearly he would not be killed because of his official character or because of an official act or omission. These gentlemen insist that here is an occasion when he is not engaged in the performance of his official duties; that while in fact he is President he is acting as a private citizen solely and is, for the time being, disassociated from his character as President. If this be true he has ceased for the time being to perform the duty of seeing that the laws are faithfully executed, and there is no element of resistance to the authority or sovereignty of the United States in the unlawful killing.

If so, the offense would be one against the peace and sovereignty of the State of New York and not the peace and sovereignty of the United States, if we accept, as we must, the doctrine enunciated in United States v. Cruikshank (92 U. S., 542); United States v. Fox (95 U. S., 670); In re Neagle (135 U. S., 1); Ex parte Tarbrough (110 U. S., 657); United States v. Harris (106 U. S., 629); Baldwin v. Franks (120 U. S., 678); United States v. Waddell (112 U. S., 76).

He then talks about "a peace of the United States" and "a peace of each of the States of the United States," which seems to be a favorite idea with him. Those phrases and the legal idea involved in coupling them together were never used by any court in this country until imported into the judicial vocabulary by the Supreme Court of the United States in the famous Neagle case (135 U. S., 1), and their use there, like so many other things in that decision, is not sustained by the weight of judicial authority, nor by an intelligent construction of the Constitution.

As my distinguished colleague from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] so justly remarked, in opening the debate against this bill, that decision has never met the approbation of the legal profession of the country; it is not supported by sound reasoning; its force is discounted by the unanswerable dissenting opinions of Chief Justice Fuller and Justice Lamar; it was pronounced in a peculiar case and under anomalous circumstances touching the court itself so nearly as to raise a reasonable suspicion of its fairness, and it will always remain a serious blur upon the otherwise consistent and unbroken decisions of the Supreme Court upon the questions involved. There is not, properly speaking, any such thing as "the peace of the United States," and no other case decided by our courts ever intimated such a fiction of law.

What the courts have always held is that an offense may be at once an offense against the Federal authority and against the State laws. If an officer of the United States is resisted or assaulted in the performance of his lawful official duty in any of the States, the offense, so far as the Federal Government is affected, consists in the resistance to the constituted authority of the United States, while the assault is a breach of the peace of the State wherein committed and punishable as such under State laws. That is all there is in this new-fangled notion of which the gentleman from New York seems so enamored as to the "dual peace of two sovereign powers."

But even the Neagle case holds that to give the Federal courts jurisdiction the official of the Federal Government must have been at the time in the actual exercise of his official duty and function. This committee report proceeds, upon this point:

We are bound to recognize that the established law is that Congress has no power to punish acts of violence committed on the person of an officer of the United States except when committed because of official acts or omissions or because of the official character or while the officer is engaged in the performance of his official duties. No opinion of any court in any case intimates that the power of the Federal Government may be exercised to protect its officers under other circumstances or conditions than those mentioned in the proposed legislation.

What we want is effective, safe legislation, not an experimental statute, or one that may gratify our pride as national legislators for the time being, irrespective of constitutional power. If we may constitutionally enact a statute punishing offenses against the person of the President when he is not engaged in the performance of his official duties (assuming there is such a time-which I deny) and when not committed because of his official character or acts or omissions, then we may constitutionally enact a law making it a Federal offense to unjustifiably assault at any time each and every officer of the Government of the United States, high or low, simply because he is such officer, and thus remove those who assault such officers from the jurisdiction of the State courts entirely.

The Supreme Court of the United States has held in at least three cases that a statute of the United States defining and punishing an offense against the United States in general terms, when the act is committed within a State, must be so framed as to show on its face that it can only apply to offenses of which the United States has jurisdiction. Hence the necessity for the words of limitation in the act, if it be true, that there is a time when the President is not engaged in the discharge of his official duties.

And right here the gentleman who wrote this report found himself inextricably tangled up by his own argument. He advocates one view of official capacity and admits that the courts have expressly repudiated that contention. He has come to the point where he can go no further, for he has demonstrated by innumerable citations of the decisions of the highest court in the Union that his bill, both the House bill and the Senate bill, both with and without the thirteenth section, despite his own and his committee's opinion, can not be made to comport with the Constitution or withstand the unbroken and unquestioned adjudications of the Supreme Court.

He says, in face of all the decisions, that he denies that there can ever be a time when the President is not engaged in the discharge of his official duties, and of course the purpose of that denial is to lay the predicate for declaring in this bill that an assault upon the President at any and at all times must necessarily be an offense against the Federal authority and justiciable in the Federal courts. But his denial, fortunately, can not control this question as one of fundamental constitutional law and jurisdiction, however potent may be his standing in the courts of his own State, which he told us not long ago had never reversed any proposition he had ever advanced.

The President, although of higher dignity and wider authority than any other Federal officer, is not distinguishable from any of them when it comes to the question of the continuity and character of his official duties. If there is never a time when he is not officially engaged—not even, as the report suggests, when he is fishing in the Adirondacks or attending a political "powwow" in some distant State—then there is never a time when any Federal officer is not performing his official duties. That was the argument of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS] on yesterday.

But the Supreme Court of the United States has many times decided and has never failed to insist that there are times when these officials are not officially engaged. Else, why the necessity and what the sense of all these cases cited by the report, in every one of which the distinction between the times of official and nonofficial status is made the very foundation of the judgment of the court?

Is it possible that for nearly a hundred years the ablest judges of the Republic, without a single variation, dissent, or suggestion of doubt, have been wrong in basing all of their decisions upon the fundamental and crucial proposition that there is a distinction between acts done by or against Federal officials according to whether they happened while the officials were or were not engaged in the performance of official duty, and that this distinction is the essential test of whether or not Congress can legislate upon the subject constitutionally?

Certainly nobody, not even the distinguished gentleman from New York, will deny that unless there is such a distinction—unless an officer can sometimes be off duty, or sometimes acting otherwise than in the performance of that duty—there is absolutely no meaning in any of the decisions that are so liberally cited in his report. In fact, if I understand the very tortuous course of his reasoning, the gentleman expressly but reluctantly yields his own weighty judgment to the established judicial precedents of the country, and has accordingly framed his bill in obedience thereto by prescribing that the offenses defined and punished shall be committed while the officials named are officially engaged, or because of their official character and conduct.

But even this did not and can not save his bill from the vice of unconstitutionality, as an act of Congress which seeks to create a Federal crime and to confer exclusive jurisdiction upon the Federal tribunals to try it, and he somewhat tardily saw the weakness of his bill; hence section 13, which, however, does not cure the defect. The unconstitutional feature of the original House bill was this:

It being conceded and irrevocably established by all the judicial decisions that there are times when Federal officials are not acting officially, and that at such times the Federal Government has no jurisdiction over offenses committed by or against them, it necessarily follows that there may arise, even under this bill, cases of assaults upon Federal officials that can not be taken cognizance of by the Federal courts, and in which the State courts will have exclusive jurisdiction. But it has been expressly decided, and is not questioned, that a Federal statute intended to operate in the several States of the Union is unconstitutional if it seeks on its face or by its necessary intendment to punish some offenses that are not subject to the authority of the United States.

It other words, the statute, to be valid, must be wholly valid; it must not include possible cases that can not be legislated upon by Congress; it must not embrace dual offenses, some of which are subject to State control and some to Federal authority. When Congress undertakes to legislate upon a subject that falls within the scope of criminal law, the legislation must be confined altogether and unmistakably to that class of offenses over which Congress can assume control under the Constitution; it can carve but once and it must spill no blood and cross no State lines in doing so. That is the rule laid down in the case of United States v. Harris (106 U. S., 629) and in the case of United States v. Reese (92 U. S., 214). Both of these decisions are cited and quoted from in the report on this bill, but their meaning is strangely perverted and misapplied by the gentleman who wrote the report. They are absolutely fatal to his bill, as he well knew, and he undertook to avoid their force and effect by adding section 13, which reverses the whole course of judicial precedents upon this subject. In the Reese case the court uses this significant language:

It would certainly be dangerous if the legislature could set a net large enough to catch all possible offenders, and leave it to the courts to step inside and say who could be rightfully detained and who should be set at large. This would, to some extent, substitute the judicial for the legislative department of the Government. The courts enforce the legislative will, when ascertained, if within the constitutional grant of power. But if Congress steps outside of its constitutional limitation and attempts that which is beyond its reach, the courts are authorized to, and when called upon must, annul its encroachment upon the reserved right of the States and the people.

The chairman of the Judiciary Committee clearly recognized the effect of this decision, for he says in his report:

The long and short of these decisions is that an act of Congress making it an offense to kill the President of the United States (when the act is committed within a State) is unconstitutional, if in general terms, provided there is any time when the President is not engaged in the performance of his official duties.

And yet, by indirection and a false assumption in the terms of the bill, he seeks to do that which the Supreme Court says ought not to be done. Knowing that there are and must be cases of assault upon the officials named in the bill that would not be subject to Federal legislation or jurisdiction, he purposely ignores that fact, includes all possible cases in the proposed law, and leaves it to the discretion of Federal judges and courts to try an offender, in plain violation of the constitutional rights of the States, by permitting them to so construe the law as to hold in every case that Federal jurisdiction attached because the offense was committed upon the official in his official capacity, or that once an official he must be deemed to be always officially engaged during his term of service. We all know how readily the Federal tribunals extend and amplify their powers and jurisdiction upon the slightest provocation and how greedily they grasp at every new subject that is placed within the reach of their all-absorbing supervision. If this bill shall, by any sort of interpretation, give a Federal judge jurisdiction to try a case of assault upon a Federal official because of his official character, it may be certainly predicted that he will never surrender his hold upon the case whatever facts may subsequently transpire to defeat his jurisdiction.

Suppose that a man is arrested under this proposed act charged with having assaulted, conspired to assault, or otherwise to injure the President of the United States or some one of the other officials named in the act, or that he has actually killed one of them. Under section 13 of the bill he is presumed to have committed the act against the official in his official capacity until the contrary is proven, and the thirteenth section further provides, somewhat unnecessarily, it would seem, that nothing in the bill shall be construed as admitting or declaring that such officials can ever act, or be in a position to be considered as acting, in any other than an official capacity.

In other words, this remarkable section is intended to confer prima facie jurisdiction upon the Federal courts in all cases where the President or anyone who may succeed to his office is killed or assaulted, no matter under what circumstances or what the said official may have been doing at the time; and it expressly provides that all of the decisions of the Supreme Court to the effect that such officials may sometimes not be acting officially shall be set aside for the purposes of this bill, Congress entertaining, through its Judiciary Committee, a different opinion from that heretofore and immemorially expressed by the Supreme Court of the United States. It may be proper and competent for Congress to abrogate and deny the authority of the tribunal charged by the Constitution with deciding constitutional questions, but I venture to say that this is the first time in the history of the Republic that a proposed bill expressly established as the basis of its constitutionality an open and avowed antagonism to the well-settled and unquestioned adjudications of the Supreme Court of the United States.

That is exactly what the thirteenth section of this bill does. It declares that every man who assaults the Federal officials named in it shall be presumed to have done so in such manner as to give the Federal courts exclusive jurisdiction of the case on the assumed ground that at the time the assault was committed the assaulted official was acting in the performance of his official duties, and moreover that Congress does not believe that the Supreme Court has ever been right in its opinion, so often and so emphatically expressed, that these officials can ever act otherwise than officially during their term of service. I submit that I do not misstate or overstate the meaning and effect of section 13 of the committee's bill.

Does anybody in this House think that the Supreme Court will regard favorably a law that on its face expresses a defiant opposition to that court's repeated decisions, and that seeks to confer Federal jurisdiction by establishing a legal presumption at total variance with the established judicial authority of the Government? I, for one, do not, and I believe that the thirteenth section, so far from being the saving virtue of this bill, as the gentleman from New York seems to think, is the fatal weakness of the whole measure, because it is not only essentially vicious and monstrous in itself, but it clearly demonstrates that it was added to the bill for the purpose of conferring an unconstitutional jurisdiction upon the Federal courts. If the gentleman who reported this bill had not seriously doubted its constitutionality, he would not have proposed the thirteenth section, and that section is a complete confession that the measure is not a valid act of Congressional legislation unless he can abrogate in some way the decisions of the courts to the effect that the United States has no control over offenses against Federal officials except in their official capacity, and that this capacity does not always exist, but is a question of fact in every particular case.

Let me recur to the illustration that I began to make. A person is arrested, indicted, and arraigned in the Federal court for an assault, or homicide, under this bill if it becomes a law. Under section 13 he appears before the court under a burden of presumptive guilt to begin with, because that section says that he is presumed to have committed an extraordinary crime—that is, an assault upon a peculiar individual, the President of the United States—and under circumstances of peculiar aggravation—that is, while such official was acting in his official capacity as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, Chief Executive of a great nation, charged by the Constitution of the United States with taking care that the laws of the whole country shall be executed, and whose safety and preservation are at all times essential to the peace and stability of the Government.

The indictment would perhaps not state all of these innuendoes, but the bill now before us and the arguments adduced in support of it presume that these would be the facts that would necessarily exist in all cases of attacks upon the President. In truth, if we must believe the terms of section 13 and the speeches of the advocates of this measure, no other state of case could possibly exist when any person assaults the President. Mark you, this is not "a rule of evidence," as I have heard some gentlemen suggest, nor a mere regulation as to the order of proof. This fatal section of the bill complies with no rule of evidence or order of proof that has ever been declared by an English-speaking people trying men for their liberties and lives in organized tribunals of justice. And here let me pause to remind some gentlemen that the Judiciary Act expressly provides that in all criminal cases tried in the Federal courts the rules of evidence prescribed or prevailing in the State where the cause is tried shall govern; so that, if this section 13 be merely a provision as to the rules of evidence, it contravenes the Judiciary Act and is in violation of the rules of evidence of every State of the Union in criminal trials for felonies.

But this section is far more than a rule of evidence. It is a statutory presumption of a fact necessary to the jurisdiction of the court and essential to the guilt of the defendant arraigned under this law. It prejudges the question of jurisdiction in such manner that no defendant can object to the Federal court's right to try him, no matter what are the facts of the real case, because under no known rule of criminal pleading could he raise the question of jurisdiction in limine if this section was the law. Worse than that, this section assumes and presumes a substantive fact contributing to the man's guilt, because it presumes and requires him to rebut by evidence that he has committed an act that is not an ordinary assault or homicide, but an extraordinary attack upon the high and mighty sovereignty of the United States in the person of one of its favored officials. Was there ever before, in trials for capital felony, a proposition to confer a doubtful jurisdiction upon a court by presuming as a matter of law and fact a material and necessary element of guilt on the part of the accused, and requiring him to prove that such presumption is not well founded?

I do not believe that the Congress of the United States ought to introduce such a dangerous and unjust innovation into the criminal jurisprudence of a free country, especially when the very terms of the section in which this provision is contained declare a doctrine contrary to all the decisions of the highest court in the land. Well, suppose the man is brought to trial, the testimony is introduced, and it appears that at the time the alleged assault or homicide occurred the President or other official was spending his vacation in some remote spot of the mountains; that he trespassed upon the property of the defendant and, being warned off, resisted; that an altercation occurred, and that the defendant committed the offense in ignorance of the identity and character of the person attacked. Would not this state of facts clearly show that the offense was a mere crime against the local laws of the State where committed, without any connection with the official's public and official character and conduct, and that therefore the case did not come within the jurisdiction of Federal legislation or the Federal courts? Would not the man be entitled to be remanded to the State courts for trial?

There is no law or procedure for remanding such a case to the State courts, and it is doubtful if Congress has the power to enact one. What, then, would occur in such a case as I have supposed? The judge would have to discharge the prisoner entirely, or instruct a verdict of acquittal by the jury. In either case the plea of former jeopardy or former acquittal would be raised if it was sought to try the defendant again in the State courts. Whether or not such plea would be good would depend on whether or not the Federal court had competent and constitutional jurisdiction to arraign the man in the first instance, and this would involve the very question that this bill seeks to settle by a presumption of law in section 13, but which is really left entirely to the discretion of the Federal judge before whom the prisoner might be brought under the first seven sections of the bill.

Now, I have no desire to wantonly attack the integrity or the fairness of the Federal courts, but I submit, in view of the practical observation and experience of the country for the last fifty years, that it is an exceedingly questionable proceeding to commit the rights of a citizen of the State and the question of the respective jurisdiction of State and Federal courts to the arbitrary decision of a Federal district judge. His discretion would necessarily be arbitrary, for it could never be revised or inquired into by any higher tribunal, since the pleas of jeopardy would have to arise and be disposed of in the State courts, and the validity of his conviction by a jury could not be investigated by the Supreme Court of the United States.

This illustrates the essential viciousness of this bill and especially the dangerous operation of section 13. It confers a doubtful jurisdiction upon the Federal court and leaves that doubt to be resolved by the irresponsible judgment of the Federal judge. Whatever course he might take, under the facts supposed, the result would be wrong. He would either try a man for his life and liberty without jurisdiction or he would let him go scot-free under the protection of a plea of former jeopardy or acquittal. Does anybody here who knows anything about the average Federal judge think that any defendant would ever be discharged or acquitted in the Federal court, no matter what might be the facts? Why, the gentleman from New York, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee of this House, and who aspires and expects to be a Federal judge, if we may believe the newspapers, has himself stated the proposition in unmistakable terms in his report on this bill. He says:

> In administering and enforcing the criminal laws of the United States the jury is not judge of the law and of the facts, but must take the law from the court and is sole judge of the facts.
> As matter of law the President is or is not always engaged in the performance of his official duties. If he always is so engaged, the court would so charge the jury, and all the proof necessary on this point would be that the person killed was acting as such generally, either de facto or de jure.

In other words, Mr. Chairman, the whole question would be in the bosom of the Federal judge, and the interpretation and application of this law would depend entirely upon what the judge might think about the question of the President being always or only sometimes in the exercise of his official duties.

I do not think any one here will doubt, in view of their expressed opinions on this floor, that the gentleman from New York, the gentleman from Wisconsin, the gentleman from Massachusetts, the gentleman from Ohio, and, in fact, nearly all of the gentlemen who are urging this bill would readily and cheerfully maintain the jurisdiction of the Federal court in the case I have stated and try the accused without any regard to his own or the rights of the State, the facts of the case, or the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. And yet no one will question that under the facts in the hypothetical case I have mentioned, according to every judicial precedent in our history, the accused would not come within the jurisdiction of the United States and would not be amenable in the Federal courts. Is not this exactly the kind of legislation that the Supreme Court declared to be vicious and unconstitutional in the Reeves case, above cited, and is this House willing, in the light of the decisions, in view of the nature of our Government, with the experience of the country as to the arrogance and usurpation of the Federal judiciary—which increase in inverse ratio to the dignity of the tribunal and the wisdom of the judge—to enact a law of this kind, committing such plenary and pernicious power to Federal officials and courts? I for one am not.

Now, the whole theory of this bill—the first seven sections—and of the gentlemen who support it is that the office of President of the United States is in some way, not known to our Constitution nor heretofore recognized by the American people, invested with a peculiar sanctity and an inherent sovereignty that surrounds its incumbent with a perpetual aureole of authority, and confers upon him some special prerogative of protection not vouchsafed to any other individual in the whole organization of the Government. This is the doctrine of sovereignty as known in the monarchical systems of the Old World. There is no place for such a doctrine in our institutions, and it will be an evil hour when we recognize and adopt it. It has been repeatedly held by the Supreme Court that there is no such sovereignty in the Federal Government as is implied in this bill, and certainly there can be no such sovereign and sacred quality attached to the person of any official of the Government.

As I have shown, the only rights, powers, and protection the President or any other official can claim are those that are conferred upon him by the laws that define his duties and impose his authority, and only in the scope of his constitutional functions and powers and when he is actually engaged therein can he claim any other immunity, prerogative, or safety of person than those enjoyed by every other citizen of the Republic. That is the American idea of officialism, that is the constitutional theory of American republican institutions. This is the first time that Congress has been asked to depart from or to contravene those principles since the odious alien and sedition laws of 1798, and it is a significant fact that this bill bears the same title that adorned the infamous Lloyd sedition bill—"to suppress crimes against the Government."

In the early case of United States v. Hudson (7 Cranch, 32) the Supreme Court said that under our system of institutions there can be no crimes against the Government as such, except the offense of treason, which is expressly defined in the Constitution itself, and can not be altered, enlarged, or diminished by any act of Congress. In that decision the court discussed incidentally the alien and sedition laws, and declared that "the common-law offense of libeling a government is ignored in constitutional systems, as being inconsistent with free institutions." It was decided that Congress has no authority to create and punish common-law crimes and confer jurisdiction upon the Federal courts, no matter how nearly the safety of the political power may be endangered. The same doctrine is announced in 1 Wheaton, 415, and 8 Peters, 658, and in fact it has not before been called in question for a hundred years of our history.

And yet this bill proposes to create a specific crime—not murder in general, but murder of the President of the United States as such and because he is such and because it is said his death by violence is a crime against the Federal Government. And the bill does not stop there. It extends this "crimen peculium" to all the other officials who may by law happen to be in the line of succession to the Presidency. An assault upon or the homicide of the Secretary of State, the Attorney-General, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of War is made a special and aggravated offense, not because of their official character as such Cabinet ministers, but because by some remote contingency of death or resignation or inability of the President they might succeed to his office.

This is going even further than the old Roman doctrine of "crimen læsæ majestatis" or the modern European doctrine of "lese majesty" ever went, for it extends the divinity of office even to those who only wait for the accidents and misfortunes of official life. This bill erects the President into a peculiar potentate whose rights as an individual are merged in his majesty as an official, and it includes in the awful circle of its solemn protection all who stand in the shadow of the throne and expect the glory of the crown. That is the plain meaning and practical operation of this bill, and no man can deceive himself as to its tendencies and its dangers to our system of popular government.

Another vicious feature of this measure, in its prospective effects as a legislative precedent, seems to have thus far escaped attention in the course of this debate. All of the cases that have heretofore arisen and been decided by our courts arose upon the question of a Federal official's rights and protection in instances where he committed some act in the course of official duty for which he was sought to be made liable in the State courts or under State authority. In other words, the issue heretofore generally presented has been one of acts done by the official, not against him. That was the case of Neagle, who claimed to have killed Colonel Terry in the necessary defense of the life of Justice Field, of the Supreme Court of the United States.

It was contended by Neagle that he was acting in the line of his duty as a deputy United States marshal, having been detailed to protect Justice Field against a murderous assault by Terry, and that the justice was at the time in the regular discharge of his duties, being on his way from one court to another; and so in most of the other cases decided. Now, it was held in all of these decisions that the official was entitled to the protection of the Federal laws and to immunity from punishment if at the very time of the act he was indeed acting in his official capacity and in the lawful scope of his duty. No presumptions of law or fact were indulged or suggested, but he was required to establish his defense by satisfactory proof. Nobody advanced the theory that he must be considered to be always officially engaged during his term of service.

That is a new idea not before seriously urged until this bill came into Congress. Now then, if we are to establish the doctrine, as this bill seeks to do in its thirteenth section, that an official of any kind must be deemed to be constantly and uninterruptedly clothed with official protection, the rule must and will be invoked both ways. If the President is always on duty for purposes of assaults upon his own person, then he must be deemed to be always protected by his official character in his assaults upon other persons. No reasonable distinction can be made in law or logic between his official capacity on the defensive and on the offensive. Consider for a moment the effect of such a principle introduced into our system of government, and it will assuredly come whenever Congress inaugurates such legislation as is contained in the first seven and the last sections of the pending bill.

This measure alone will put six of our chief Federal officials in a class by themselves, establishing as to them the presumption of law and fact that they are always to be deemed as acting officially. As to five of them it is actually established that they must be presumed to be always discharging the duties of an office which they do not in fact hold and to which they can only succeed in case of the retirement of the sixth one. Now, I quite agree with what several gentlemen have said in the course of this debate, that there is no good reason for making this bill applicable to the President and his possible successors that does not apply with equal force to all other Federal officials. In truth, I think there are many others who are more likely to be in need of this extraordinary protection than the President and his Cabinet. The judges of the Federal courts who travel all over the country, the marshals, deputy marshals, revenue officers, and other executive officials who constitute the real working force of the Government are all much more in danger of attacks and much more essential to the practical execution of the laws than the select few high dignitaries housed in Washington.

So that I can see no good reason for applying the principle of monopoly and favoritism in the distribution of the sovereign prerogatives of this new system of Federal officialism, and if we begin it now it is only a question of time when it will be extended to include the whole class of Federal officeholders. Then we will have a privileged class of Government immunes, protected by a perpetual panoply of Federal jurisdiction and power as to offenses committed both by them and against them, with the Federal judiciary to administer the laws framed for the peculiar preservation of this officeholding aristocracy. That is the possible outcome of this whole movement, and those of us who have watched the rapidity of recent lapses from the primitive ideas of constitutional government in this Republic can not but regard it as altogether probable under the domination of the Republican party.

But, Mr. Chairman, aside from all questions of constitutional and legal interpretation, the fundamental, practical objection to this measure is that it is wholly unnecessary. Gentlemen have said that there is a universal, popular clamor for some bill of this kind. I deny it. Sensational newspapers, spectacular advocates of "the strenuous life," hysterical pessimists and interested politicians have sought to create such a clamor, but the great mass of sensible, patriotic Americans, calm and conservative in their abiding faith in the constitutional vigor of the Government as the fathers framed it, and looking to the love and loyalty of an intelligent citizenship, organized into domestic State sovereignties, as the best and safest protection the Union and its officials can have, have not asked and are not asking any such radical and revolutionary legislation as is embodied in this bill.

Directly after the assassination of the President last summer there were no doubt popular paroxysms demanding all sorts of violent and extreme measures of vengeance and vindication against imaginary evils, but the sober, sound judgment of the people of this country has not demanded and will not approve any law that seeks to overturn well-settled doctrines of constitutional and criminal law; that imports into our system of government the alien ideas of imperialism and official prerogative; that reflects odiously upon the loyalty of the State governments and courts and sets up a scheme of exclusive Federal jurisdiction over Federal officeholders at variance with the whole doctrine of popular sovereignty and official responsibility to the laws of the land.

Three times in forty years the crack of the assassin's pistol has brought the nation to its knees in prayerful horror and roused the nation's temper to righteous resentment, but in none of these crises was there anything to excite permanent distrust in the efficacy of existing laws, or to create a solid apprehension as to the soundness and stability of our institutions and of the public virtue that supports them. In the first case the surrounding conditions of the scene and the peculiar personal circumstances of the crime clearly demonstrated the mania of the murderer and the absence of any sympathy with his crime even among those whom he fanatically sought to benefit.

The second case was so abundantly shown to have been the result of personal disappointment and political intrigue, temporary in their nature and isolated in their consequences, that no possible indication of public danger could be inferred from the transaction. The third and last occurrence, although differing from the other two in that it introduced the element of an abstract and impersonal hostility to the Government itself, can not, on mature consideration, be considered to warrant any belief in the existence of the same sentiments among any appreciable portion of our population, and still less can it be deemed a justification for a sudden and dangerous departure from the approved principles of our Constitution and the accepted canons of our national life.

There are significant facts about these three assassinations that ought to be remembered in connection with this bill. Two of them were dealt with by the Federal authorities and one by the State. In the first the assassin met his death in the attempt to capture him, but his supposed associates were prosecuted and punished in a manner that, I may be permitted to say at this late day, and I will say, whatever may be thought of the propriety of the statement, was discreditable to the humanity and justice of the Federal Government and will ever remain a blot on the history of those calamitous times.

The second case was tried through weary weeks of the law's delay, surrounded by a gaping multitude of sensation mongers right here in the capital of the nation, and his trial was obstructed and impeded by every frivolous technicality and special plea that promised hope of success, and when he was finally convicted and executed it was with the universal feeling that the whole proceeding had been a farce if not a tragical conclusion to the life of an irresponsible lunatic. Those two cases are the only examples we have had of Federal jurisdiction and procedure in the protection of the President. Contrast with them the third case, which was tried by a State court.

The proceedings were prompt to the verge of haste. There was no opportunity allowed for the cultivation or the gratification of sensationalism either during the trial or afterwards. The man was speedily tried and unhesitatingly condemned. In spite of the fact that had the crime been committed upon any other person than the President of the United States it is doubtful if the plea of insanity would not have easily availed to save his life. Now, I submit that when we come to compare these contrasted exhibitions of the relative merits of Federal and State jurisdiction and judicial procedure in such cases the advantage is vastly on the side of the State authority, and the argument for a change in past conditions is not supported by the actual experience and observation of the country.

One would imagine, to hear some of the speeches that have been delivered in favor of this measure, that unless we pass this bill and assert the extraordinary authority in the Federal officials and courts that is demanded by it, the President will be utterly defenseless against assassination and assault, and red-handed anarchy will go unpunished. Why, no assassin has ever escaped or ever will. They have all been done to death, much more promptly under State than under Federal laws. That is all that ought to be expected and all that can possibly be expected, even if this bill is passed. It is said that this law will prevent and discourage the killing of the President, and that it should be passed for that reason, irrespective of the actual punishment after the crime shall be committed.

The bill imposes no greater or more deterrent punishment than the laws of murder do everywhere in this Union, except perhaps one State. It takes the life of the assassin, and that is all any civilized law can do. And let me say here, there is no sort of law that will prevent a real anarchist from wreaking his imaginary vengeance on a hated government and its officials. On the contrary, the more terrors that are placed around the commission of his deed the more heroic it becomes in his sight, and his highest hope is realized if he can sacrifice his life amid the sovereign pomp and panoply of the government's extremest exhibition of power and precaution.

To him bodyguards, police vigilance, the mightiest efforts of organized authority, which he regards as organized despotism, only serve to whet his appetite for official gore and nerve his courage to do and die in the most spectacular, the most sensational, and the most extraordinary manner possible. So, if you are framing the unusual penalties and safeguards of this bill with any idea that it will strike terror to the soul of a single anarchist or nihilist who really desires a President's death, you are doing a vain and useless thing.

The history of the Old World demonstrates that death in its most horrible forms, exile in its most pitiless cruelty, ceaseless and unrelenting extermination pursued by most fearful methods, have no effect to quell the passions or to calm the frenzied souls of those whom age-long tyranny has made mad or wild speculation upon impossible schemes has deprived of normal reason.

It is also urged that this bill will secure uniformity in the laws of murder throughout the Union, at least so far as the President is concerned. To my mind, that is the most puerile and illogical of all the arguments advanced.

There is to-day practical uniformity in the laws of homicide in all the States. There may be technical differences in the distinctions between murder and manslaughter and between the degrees of murder and variations as to penalties, but in all practical and substantial respects the law of unlawful and willful murder is the same everywhere, unless it be in one State. Besides, this talk about uniformity of laws is but another manifestation of the growing disposition on the part of the Federal Government to invade and absorb the domestic jurisdiction of the States; it is a part of the general scheme of the Republican party to centralize all powers in the hands of the official ring that controls its destinies and seeks to dominate the destiny and the liberty of the people of the whole country.

There is no necessity for this law to take away the jurisdiction of the States over those matters that are by the Constitution expressly reserved to them. They have never shown a disposition to betray their trust in enforcing all proper and necessary laws for the protection of the President or any other Federal official, but quite the contrary. It would be an odious and unwarranted reflection upon the love and loyalty of the States for the Union to pass a law that necessarily implies, if it does not expressly declare, a distrust of their ability and willingness to discharge their full duty toward the Chief Magistrate of the Republic and the safety of the common government of the country.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not wish and I have not time to enter into all of the objectionable details of this bill. There is scarcely a section or a paragraph in it that is not open to fundamental questions of constitutionality and to substantial objections on account of the loose, uncertain, and unintelligible phraseology of the law it announces. There is no attempt to define any of the terms that are used and which contain the essential elements of any and all the offenses sought to be punished.

Such terms as "organized governments," "civilized governments," are used with reference to offenses against foreign governments and their rulers, with no attempt to define them. In fact they are not capable of legal definition and that accuracy of terminology requisite in a penal statute. They ought never to have been used at all in this bill, and, in my judgment, there is no warrant in the Constitution or common sense for this Government undertaking to punish vague and general crimes against foreign governments, civilized or uncivilized. We are not the policemen of Christendom, nor are we charged with a supervision over the safety and social or political peace of other nations. When we enter upon that mission and essay that task, it is only a step further to punish political offenses at home and to deny the right of asylum to the oppressed political exiles of the Old World, some of whom have been the noblest friends and patriots this country has ever known.

Then when we come to examine those sections that refer to the exclusion from immigration and naturalization of those nondescript people who, for want of a better term, are popularly called "alien anarchists," the bill trenches upon dangerous and questionable legislative territory. Nobody sympathizes with a lawless enemy of organized government. Nobody wants them to come to this country. Nobody seeks to apologize for or to condone their miscreant crimes or chronic hostility to peace, order, and law. But it is a difficult and delicate matter to undertake to define and punish or exclude men for these somewhat speculative offenses, and it is very evident that this bill does not deal with the subject delicately or deftly.

There are expressions in some of the sections here that would or might be construed to exclude some of the ablest, the wisest, and most benevolent thinkers of the world. I doubt if Tolstoi or Krapotkin or Herbert Spencer could come to this country under the provisions of the proposed law. Henry George and Edward Bellamy would not be eligible as immigrants under it. Tom Paine and Thomas Jefferson would unmistakably have violated its requirements.

Voltaire, Volney, Rousseau, Hegel, Schopenhauer, Renan, nearly every great leader of public thought in Europe for a century, would be barred from American citizenship under the strict construction of this bill. William Jennings Bryan, Webster Davis, every Democrat who made speeches in the last two campaigns, are narrowly capable of being law-abiding men under this law. It will not answer this to say that the bill does not propose to punish or to take cognizance of mere intellectual opinions, or that it does not contemplate ostracism toward scholars, philosophers, and statesmen.

The terms of the bill are broad enough and loose enough to reach them all, and in the construction and enforcement of a law I know of no immunity that attaches to intellectual aristocrats or political pioneers. The fact is, we have already from a very distinguished source, and one that this bill contemplates as capable of none but an official infallibility, an expression on this very subject that indicates clearly what may be the meaning of this bill if construed and enforced by the party in power. In the President's message of last December we find the following language in regard to the assassination of President McKinley:

> When we turn from the man to the nation, the harm done is so great as to excite our gravest apprehension and to demand our wisest and most resolute action. This criminal was a professed anarchist, inflamed by the teachings of professed anarchists, and probably also by the reckless utterances of those who, on the stump and in the public press, appeal to the dark and evil spirits of malice and greed, envy, and sullen hatred. The wind is sowed by the men who preach such doctrines, and they can not escape their share of responsibility for the wirlwind that is reaped. This applies alike to the deliberate demagogue, to the exploiter of sensationalism, and to the crude and foolish visionary who, for whatever reason, apologizes for crime or excites aimless discontent.

Surely we may hesitate to deal loosely with statutory language on this subject when such utterances as this emanate from the head of the Government and the leader of the dominant party demanding this law.

The title of this bill, as I have before stated, is in part the same as the infamous sedition law of the old Federal party, and there is a malign sense and historic odium in the very words "crime against government."

Now, Mr. Chairman, I sympathize with the difficulties that confronted the Judiciary Committee in considering and reporting this measure, and I accord them all due patriotism, prudence, and patience in dealing with it. Especially do I appreciate the delicacy and difficulty of handling the question of "anarchy," as it is called. But I must beg to believe and to say that I think there is room for considering anarchy from a more practical and a closer point of view than is done in this bill.

If it is to be suppressed by unusual, questionable, and extraordinary legislation like this, might we not ask whether its causes, in this country at least, can not be removed and no medium furnished for its cultivation and growth either as a foreign or a domestic product. Anarchy may be a cult or it may be a condition. As a cult I do not think we are in much danger of its spread or influence, for the academic anarchy of the socialistic school is not likely to ever appeal much to the American mind or develop anything more than scholastic speculations. As a condition of social unrest, political discontent, resentment against the Government, and a brooding spirit of hostility to existing inequalities of life, labor, and prosperity, anarchy can be produced and encouraged by the very same causes here that have produced it abroad.

Oppression, discrimination in laws and policies between the various classes and interests of the community, monopolies and trusts, an odious system of national taxation, loss of respect for the justice, humanity, and patriotism of the ruling powers—these are the things that will as certainly breed lawless violence and secret intrigues against the Government in America as they have done so in every Old World monarchy. If I sought to designate the most prolific and dangerous source of the anarchistic spirit among our own people, I would indict the prevailing policies and practices of those who are so loudly demanding this extraordinary legislation and who so arrogantly denounce as malcontents and disturbers of prosperity all others who may differ from their judgment and decry their abuses.

Mr. Chairman, I shall vote against this bill, believing it to be unnecessary, unconstitutional, un-American, and a vain attempt to do those things that can already be done, as far as they ought to be done, under the established and well-approved practices of the Government under the Constitution as our fathers understood it and obeyed it. If we are to enter upon this new and untried path of imperial prerogative in our Federal Executive and of unconstitutional power in our Federal courts, it will not be with my support or approval.

I regard this measure as dangerous and revolutionary, not so much in what it expresses as in what it implies; not so much for its actual provisions as for its potential possibilities; not so much for what it enacts as for what it portends. It introduces a new note in our national life, an alien principle in our system of institutions.

It seeks to base official and governmental authority not upon love and loyalty and the spontaneous affection of the people, but upon force and fear and the spirit of compulsory homage to artificial attributes of pomp and power. It savors of kingly prerogative, divine right, imperial seclusion and exclusion on the part of the chief officers of the Republic.

It suggests bodyguards, the vigilance of suspicious and vengeful power afraid of the source from which it sprung and forever asserting its existence to compel an obedience it does not inspire. It presupposes the necessity for special safeguards against nameless terrors of resentment and hostility on the part of the people toward their chosen officers where there should be no relation but one of trust and confidence, no sentiment but one of mutual respect and loyalty.

Cæsar walked the streets of Rome unattended and without arms while he was yet the idol of the populace and sought no honors above the gift of their voluntary suffrages. It was only when the dreams of empire had made him cautious and the designs of despotism had clouded his frankness that he demanded lictors to surround his person and wore a dagger in his bosom.

Cromwell slept on a pallet among his soldiers while he was the Great Commoner seeking only his country's freedom and happiness; but when the idea of royal power once entered his mind he retired to a separate tent with a sentinel at the door. I do not seek to parallel these instances of imperial ambition with any present condition in this day and country, but moral motives are the same in all ages and among all men, and the manifestations of human aspirations and human tendencies will never change.

The policy embodied in this bill will not end with the passage or the defeat of the bill. It is only the beginning of a movement that needs to be checked rather than encouraged, and the greatest crime against our own Government that we can commit will be to destroy the essential simplicity and harmony of its constitutional organization by importing into its methods and practices the ideas and principles that have destroyed free governments and desolated popular liberties in all ages and since time began.

As I have listened to some of the eloquent arguments made in behalf of the security and majesty of the Presidential office, and the necessity for suppressing all anarchistic sentiments and exhibitions by extraordinary and novel expedients, it has seemed to me that gentlemen have entirely mistaken the theory of our Government and the real sources of its safety and power. They have also mistaken the causes and preventatives of anarchy.

The only enduring supremacy that can ever bless a popular government must be founded upon the reasonable and voluntary respect and obedience of its people. The only effective protection any officer in such a government can expect or should ask is the spontaneous and loyal affection his own conduct should command from those who have honored him by their trust and elevation to power.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to my colleague, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND], such time as he may require.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, this measure has been discussed to some extent and by some persons in a way that would indicate that, while considering it, they have lost sight of the nature and the character of our own Government. I do not intimate that they are not acquainted with the nature and character of our institutions, but, as I said before, I think, in talking about the bill, perhaps they have not had them in view.

Some seem to think that when there is no provision made by the National Government, by Federal legislation, for some condition of things existing or possible there is a dearth of legislation. Our Government, as we all know, though perhaps we sometimes forget the fact, is organized and conducted upon a system and plan untried elsewhere in the world, or at least nowhere else so fully worked out or so well understood as among our own people.

Our Constitution was given life by the ratification of individual Commonwealths. These several Commonwealths granted to the General Government such powers and functions as their people thought proper and advisable to part with and reserved to themselves and to the people of the several Commonwealths all the power not granted to the Federal Government.

In some respects rights are protected and rights are enforced by Federal legislation; in others they are protected and enforced equally as well by State legislation. So that whether the protection of life, liberty, and property, whether the protection or enforcement of this right or that right, is secured by Federal legislation or by State legislation, is not so important as it is to determine what legislation should be by the State and what by the Federal Government to determine rightfully the lines of limitation between the two sovereignties.

Everywhere in the United States the crime of murder is denounced and suitable provision is made for the punishment of those who perpetrate it. What is true of this and other great crimes is true also of the lesser crimes.

So far as the people of foreign station are concerned, so far as the lives of foreigners are involved, the question is not so much as to what jurisdiction affords protection and secures and enforces rights. It is whether there is protection and conservation of rights.

Some persons seem to be greatly troubled because this right or that right which the citizen of a foreign jurisdiction may have is not or may not be properly protected under some Federal law. They often suggest that foreigners do not understand our system; that when they are told that redress is provided under the laws of the various States, rather than under National Legislature, for alleged wrongs under which their citizens are supposed to suffer in this country, they do not understand what we mean, and do not think our legislation is adequate.

Such suggestion appears sometimes relative to cases where application is made to our Government for indemnity for wrongs alleged to have been done to citizens of a foreign government. A familiar instance is that which arises, and has arisen a number of times, when subjects of a foreign jurisdiction have met with violence in this country, as when certain lynchings of Italians took place in Louisiana and Colorado. As a matter of fact, so far as the punishment of those who inflict the wrongs is concerned, in all local jurisdictions they are abundantly provided for.

Some parties entertain the view that our Government would be more effective if a larger amount of power to legislate were in the central Government, in Congress, and less in the State governments; if more were done by Congress and less by the State legislatures. That is a matter of theory and a matter of judgment. As for myself, I believe that our system is very much and for very many reasons the best ever yet wrought out among men.

I believe that local self-government—and by local self-government I mean that which is provided by our system, by our States, and the small subdivisions of the States—is altogether, in the great multitude of the affairs and concerns of the people, the best that could be devised, the best that ever has been devised. I believe that the functions of a national government, organized as ours is, are abundantly performed and fulfilled when concerns purely of a national character are attended to by the nation; that by this means of Federal action in national affairs and State action in local affairs both national and local interests and rights are best preserved, advanced, and enforced.

These preliminary observations—very trite and very commonplace, of course; thoroughly within the understanding and information of all—are not inappropriate, it seems to me, in approaching the discussion of this bill. In other words, I think that this proposed legislation which we are now considering ought not to be predicated upon the theory that it is absolutely necessary on account of lack of local or special legislation—that is, legislation by and under our States—adequate to meet our wants, national or individual.

Under the laws that exist, the wrongful taking of a human life is punished in every part of this Union—not punished always in the same way, but punished according to the law of the particular jurisdiction. There is no immunity to the offender. The laws are ample, and the laws, in the main, are well executed.

The warrant for legislation by the Federal Government must be found in the Constitution. The States do not derive their power from the Federal Government, but the Federal Government derives its power from the States. Authority in the Federal Government is not to be presumed, but must be established, or Federal legislation can not be upheld. The power of the State to legislate is not to be sought in some special grant from the Federal Government, because no such grant ever was made, and no such grant ever could be made. The State is simply deprived of that jurisdiction of which by the Constitution it and its sister States voluntarily deprived themselves; that is all.

The first question concerning this bill, and the one which has demanded the most consideration, and around which most of the discussion thus far has ranged, is as to whether the limitation which the authors of this bill have thought proper to incorporate in it is necessary or wise. I care to discuss it only as to its necessity.

The particular limiting or qualifying words in the House bill offered by the House Judiciary Committee as a substitute for the Senate bill, and which I prefer to the Senate bill, are these:

While he is engaged in the performance of his official duties, or because of his official character, or because of any of his official acts or omissions—

Now, it is suggested by some gentlemen—and the Senate bill is drawn upon that theory—that this qualification is unnecessary. As to whether it is wise, if unnecessary—whether it should be incorporated if it need not be—I will not stop to discuss. The committee which reported this bill proceeded upon the theory that it is an absolutely necessary qualification.

I fully concur with the committee in that view. If that is not a correct view, then there need be no limitation fixed with reference to the President of the United States or the Vice-President, or those who may succeed to the Presidency, or anyone else, except solely upon the official character of the officer; but Federal jurisdiction may supplant State jurisdiction in every State of the Union, provided only that the person against whom any offense is committed is a Federal officeholder.

The question where you will draw your line—what officers shall be within the protection of your legislation—is, of course, a question of judgment and discretion; but the matter of constitutional power to legislate is absolutely fixed at one place or the other. Either there is complete constitutional power to provide for Federal jurisdiction and the punishment in the Federal courts of anybody for any offense committed against any officer of the United States, or there must be a limitation such as that imposed in this House bill.

One of those conclusions, it seems to me, is absolutely irresistible. If there can be legislation here conferring upon the Federal courts jurisdiction to try and punish offenders for offenses committed against the President as President, there can also be, under the Constitution, full power and authority, if Congress sees fit to pass such a bill, to provide for the trial, conviction, and punishment, exclusively in the Federal courts, of anybody and everybody who commits an offense against the humblest fourth-class postmaster in the land.

Now, I do not see where the line can be drawn unless it be drawn either upon the official function, upon the fact that the man is an officer of the United States, or upon the fact that, being an officer of the United States, he is engaged in the discharge of his official duty, that the offense committed against him is an offense committed with reference to his official station and because of his official station or official acts.

Now, I may be wrong about this, of course. I have observed a great many times, perhaps sometimes during the progress of this debate, that gentlemen, while very positive in their own views, according to the conceptions of others, may be very far wrong in the conclusions which they reach; but it seems to me that you can not determine jurisdiction to legislate by the height of station or the humbleness of station of the official.

There either is under the Federal Constitution full and ample power in the Congress of the United States to provide for the trial and the punishment by Federal courts and Federal machinery of everybody who commits an offense against an officeholder of the United States because he is an officeholder, or you must come to some such distinction, some such limitation, some such qualification as that which I think is aptly enough expressed in the language of this House bill. How can it be otherwise?

As to the right or as to the power of the Congress to provide for the trial and punishment of those who commit offenses against officers of the United States in the discharge of their official duties, I take it that there can be no question. There has been none, I think, from the foundation of Government.

A somewhat different question which is presented, and which I merely mention and touch upon in passing and do not care to discuss, is whether the same philosophy applies to the case of an offense committed against an officer because he did something in an official capacity, or because in his official capacity he failed or refused to do something—an offense inspired by revenge, disappointment, ill-will.

I do not think it is entirely clear that if an attack is made upon an officer of the United States which does not interfere with the discharge of the duties of his office, or at a time when he is not engaged in the discharge of official duty, but made upon him on account of something official in the past—I have some doubt about whether in that case there is under the Constitution jurisdiction in the Congress to provide for the punishment of the offense, provided it be committed in a State and outside of the exclusive jurisdiction of the General Government.

Mr. Chairman, passing from that matter, it is, of course, elementary law, well known to the profession, and known to a great many outside of the profession as well, that whatever it is necessary to allege in an indictment it is necessary to prove in order to justify the conviction of the accused. I think that probably is a principle the soundness of which will hardly be questioned. It is necessary also not only to prove it by a preponderance of the evidence, but by well-established principles of law, universal under our system and that from which we derive the rudiments of our law, it is necessary to establish the fact of guilt and every essential fact involved in the accusation by such weight of evidence as leaves no reasonable doubt that the accused is guilty as charged.

Now, if I am right about that, if I am right about the other proposition, that in order to confer Federal jurisdiction some such limitation or qualification as that which I quoted, and which the committee recommends and incorporates in the House substitute, is essential, then it must inevitably follow that it is necessary to establish that the allegation upon which jurisdiction is predicated is true; as necessary as to establish the body of the crime charged.

There are some additional reasons, I think, why this view would be likely to obtain if an actual test were made, if the matter were actually passed upon by a competent tribunal, such as the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. GILBERT. Would it disturb you if I were to ask you a question?

Mr. DE ARMOND. No; but I think I will get through quicker by going right on. When I have concluded what I have to say, I shall be glad to try to answer any question.

It will be observed that the death penalty is to be assessed, according to the provisions of this bill, against persons who under the common law or under the laws of our several States would not be punished so severely. The definition is not of murder in the first degree, that murder on account of which in our system the death penalty is inflicted.

Under this bill the death penalty is to be inflicted for an offense which at common law might be no more than manslaughter, which under our various State statutes might be murder in the first degree, or murder in the second degree, or manslaughter in any one of three or four degrees, as in some States they have it. Under the provisions of this bill a person guilty of an offense that, according to State law, would be punishable only by imprisonment, or possibly even by fine alone, would be punishable by death, that being the only penalty prescribed.

Now, that being true, it being true that the death penalty may be inflicted for an offense which does not rise above even the lowest degree of manslaughter, would it not be held necessary to sustain a conviction that every element, every particular necessary to be charged in the indictment, be proved? In other words, would it not be necessary in every such case to prove not only that the homicide was committed, but that it was committed upon one of these specified officers, and that it was committed under the circumstances specified in the bill—committed while the officer was engaged in the performance of his official duty, or because of his official character, or because of his official acts or omissions? I think it would.

Mr. LANHAM. And if omitted, would it not be a bad indictment and subject to demurrer under this law?

Mr. DE ARMOND. I think there is no possible question about that.

Mr. GILBERT. And that no Federal question would be raised without that.

Mr. LANHAM. And if alleged, would it not have to be proved?

Mr. DE ARMOND. I think there is no question about that.

Mr. LANHAM. Then does not section 13——

Mr. DE ARMOND. I was just coming to section 13. Section 13 provides:

> That in all prosecutions under the provisions of the first seven sections of this act it shall be presumed, until the contrary is proved, that the President of the United States, or Vice-President of the United States, or other officer of the United States entitled by law to succeed to the Presidency, as the case may be, was, at the time of the commission of the alleged offense, engaged in the performance of his official duties. Nothing in this act contained shall be construed as an admission or declaration that there is a time when either of such officers, during the tenure of his office, is not engaged in the performance of his official duties.

Now, taking this section with the rest of the bill, I think we come to this: First, it is necessary to allege something equivalent to what it is provided in this bill must be alleged in order to give the Federal court jurisdiction—that is, that one of the specified officers was engaged in the discharge of his official duty when assaulted, or was assaulted because of his official character, or because of something done in the discharge of his duty, or omitted in his official capacity.

That is absolutely necessary under this bill. Unless all the things necessary to be alleged are established beyond a reasonable doubt the accused is entitled to an acquittal; and yet section 13 presumes the existence of two or more of the essential facts without which there would be no jurisdiction in the court.

If I am not wrong about the history of it, this section 13 is an afterthought. Perhaps it was suggested by a supposed difficulty or uncertainty in making proof deemed absolutely essential. This is a concession, I think, and a very proper one, an inevitable one, that the jurisdictional fact is necessary to be found by the jury, not as a fact in detail, but in the sum total of the findings which will result in a verdict of "guilty," not only that the homicide was committed, but that it was committed upon one of those specified officers, when he was engaged in the discharge of his official duties or because of something he had done or omitted to do in his official capacity.

Can it be constitutional to provide that when a man is on trial for his life there shall be presumed a fact, without which there is no jurisdiction in the court which tries him, without which there can not be an offense under the Federal law, if the alleged crime occurs in a State? It does seem to me that this section 13 can not be constitutional.

Mr. GILBERT. Can a man be tried by due process of law if he be tried in a tribunal that presumes him guilty?

Mr. DE ARMOND. I think not. Here are some of the early amendments to the Constitution, which are really almost a part of the original document itself:

ARTICLE V.

> No person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia, when in actual service in time of war or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself; nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation.

ARTICLE VI.

> In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defense.

Mr. Chairman, referring to the clause of Article VI, among the rights of the accused is that of being confronted with the witnesses against him. With what witness against him would he be confronted under section 13, with reference to the important, material, jurisdictional fact of a homicide having been committed upon one in an official station, in the discharge of his official duties, or on account of something done or something omitted in his official capacity?

With what witness is he to be confronted as to that? Suppose there was no section 13, and no presumption, and suppose there was no evidence as to whether the victim of the assault was in the discharge of his official duties. It will, perhaps, be an impossible sort of a supposition; but for the illustration, suppose there was no evidence offered upon either side as to whether the person who had been slain was acting in his official capacity or was an official in fact, or whether the assault upon him that resulted in his death was made on account of something that he had done officially or something that officially he had omitted to do, would not there be a fatal defect in proof; would not that be a case in which the accused—whatever the aggravation of the assault itself; however base and murderous the crime—would in the Federal court necessarily have to be acquitted? Why? Because a material fact, one of the material facts, is that the person assaulted and slain was an officer, was in the discharge of his official duties, or that he was slain because as an officer he had done or failed to do something.

If that is true, then the accused is entitled, of course, to be confronted with the witnesses who testify to that fact, just as he is entitled, constitutionally entitled, to be confronted with the witnesses testifying to the fact and circumstances of the homicide. How can you take away from him, under the Constitution, that absolute right, by presuming against him any fact which it is absolutely necessary to allege in the indictment and as imperatively necessary to prove in order to convict him?

How can that be "due process of law?" He is entitled to that. How can that be trial according to the principles of common law? He is entitled to that.

Take the venue, if you please; of course, if a man is indicted for an offense in a county, State, or district, it is necessary to allege the venue. It is not only necessary to allege that he committed the offense, but it is necessary to allege where he committed it; necessary to allege that he committed it within the jurisdiction of the court. It is not sufficient to indict a man with all the formality which ingenuity and experience have suggested for drawing indictments if you leave out the place of the commission of the offense.

It is equally fatal—and no more fatal—to allege the venue beyond the jurisdiction of the tribunal in which he is indicted and by which he is tried. Isn't it just as competent and just as constitutional to provide that there shall be presumed on the trial of any person charged with any offense, that it shall be presumed that the offense was committed within the jurisdiction of the tribunal trying it? I think that would hardly be held to be good law. I think it would contravene the principles of all constitutions, State and Federal, and would contravene the principles that are applicable to trials under the common law and common experience and common fairness.

And so you might go on. You might take element after element. Although it would be an extreme illustration, I believe it would be just as constitutional to provide that when one is on trial, accused of any offense, it shall be presumed that he committed the act. Of course the homicide is the core or center of the whole crime against which this bill is directed, but that is not enough here, there must be more than that. In other words, if you can presume any of the things necessary to be alleged, necessary to be established, in order to give jurisdiction, in order to warrant a conviction, can you escape proof of any of them by presuming their existence, even if a statute says you may do so? I do not think you can.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the gentleman?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. DE ARMOND. I will.

Mr. RAY of New York. Is not this provision of the bill rather a definition of the meaning of the words? That is, it says, "while engaged in the performance of an official duty." Now, this section 13 defines the meaning of those words. It says that he shall be presumed during the incumbency of his office to always be engaged in official duty. Of course everyone would concede that we could not legislate and say that the sun would be presumed to shine upon our side of the earth at 12 o'clock midnight. That would be trying to legislate into existence a fact that we could not do by legislative enactment. But can we not by legislative enactment define the meaning of words?

Mr. DE ARMOND. I concede that by legislation you can define the meaning of words, but I do not understand this to be a definition. In the first place, the words are susceptible of being clearly understood; they have no ambiguous meaning. But if it were conceded that they have, or if you desire to give to them some restricted or enlarged meaning, I concede very readily that it is entirely competent in the law to declare the meaning you do give them. Unless the meaning is thus declared they have their ordinary, their usual meaning. You can by legislative definition give to them any other meaning you please to have them carry.

But I submit there is no definition about this. A presumption is not a definition.

Engaged in the discharge of the duties of his office.

Suppose you wish to give to those words some meaning which they would not otherwise have, how can you do it? Do you say "presumed to be engaged?" "Engaged" to what extent? That is not defined. To which of these words do you give a new meaning? Not to one of them.

Mr. LANHAM. May I ask my friend a question?

Mr. DE ARMOND. Certainly, if it relates to the matter I am now discussing.

Mr. LANHAM. Does not the same presumption extend also to the Vice-President?

Mr. DE ARMOND. Oh, of course; certainly. The case is all the same with any of these officers.

Mr. LANHAM. In that connection I want to call the gentleman's attention for a moment to certain language used in the report of the committee:

So, should such a thing occur, if the President is engaged in a personal quarrel as to some private matter, while that act is not an official act, he is still in and about the performance of his official duties as President.

As to the Vice-President and members of the Cabinet no such claim can be made. The Vice-President can not act until Congress meets. His constitutional duty is to preside over the Senate.

And again:

In case of the Vice-President no such rule applies. His only official duties are to preside over the Senate, and hence he can not be engaged in the performance of his official duties until the Senate assembles pursuant to law.

And yet it is presumed here that the Vice-President is always in the discharge of his duty,

Mr. DE ARMOND. Of course if the Vice-President should be killed when not acting as President or when not presiding over the Senate—when the Senate is not in session—the proof of those facts would rebut the presumption and no harm would result.

But as a matter of verbal criticism I think my colleague is entirely right about the matter. The presumption, according to section 13, extends to all these officers alike. The question merely would be, when it is undertaken to rebut the presumption as to any one of them, whether the evidence is of a sufficiently satisfactory character to do so.

Mr. LANHAM. The report of the committee shows the violence of that presumption in the case of the Vice-President.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Well, I think that is in the nature of a verbal criticism of the section.

Mr. LANHAM. It is in contradiction of the doctrine of the report.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I think it is in the nature of a verbal criticism of the section.

Mr. VANDIVER. Will my colleague [Mr. DE ARMOND] yield to me for a moment before leaving the point he is now discussing? I want to call his attention to an explanation given a moment ago by the gentleman from New York as to section 13.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I would rather not yield now for that, as I am engaged upon another point.

As to the matter of definition, which the gentleman from New York has suggested, I submit there is no element of definition here. There is nothing here that at all suggests what is to be regarded as the meaning of these words. There is no attempt to say, for instance, that the phrase "while he is engaged in the performance of his official duties" is to have some particular meaning—that the word "engaged" or the word "performance" is to have a meaning that it does not always have.

If this were in the nature of a definition there would be some words of that kind enlarged or limited, but none of the words have anything attached in the way of defining them. These words mean no more and no less on account of section 13. That section does not purport to add to or take from a solitary one of these words, to give any additional meaning or to take away any meaning, or to color or shade any meaning. So this can not be a definition.

Now, it is either a presumption of law or a presumption of fact for which section 13 provides. There may be some discussion about that. I think it is a presumption of fact. I think the question whether the President or any other officer is engaged in the discharge of his legal duties at any particular time is a matter of fact. If that be not so, then comes in the other question—whether it shall be presumed as a matter of law that the officer is always engaged in the discharge of his duty. I do not see how that can be a presumption of law. I do not see how it can be true as a matter of fact.

There is in section 13 "a saving clause," or what was designed to be such, that nothing in this section shall be taken as a confession or admission that the officer is not always in the discharge of his duty.

Now, take one of the officers who is to succeed to the Presidency in a certain case, the Secretary of State or the Secretary of the Treasury or some of these other officers. What sort of reason or philosophy is there in presuming or supposing, as a matter of law or as a matter of fact, that any officer is always engaged in the discharge of his official duties?

Can there be such a thing in the constitution of human nature and human government? Can there be such a thing as that a mortal man can be always engaged in the discharge of his official duty? Is it a physical or human possibility? He can be in office during his whole term, and gentlemen, I think, confound these two ideas.

A man elected for a specific term, four years, as is the President, is from the time of his inauguration to the time of the expiration of his term, if he live through the term, an officer; he is President every minute of those years, awake or asleep, in the city of Washington or in the remotest part of the Union, possible on the high seas, or even in a foreign land; he is President so long as he does not do something which takes him out of office, until his official functions terminate. He is an officer, but is he always discharging the duties of his office?

As I said before, is it not absolutely beyond human power, is it not decreed upon the human race in the creation, that no man can always be engaged in the discharge of official duties or any other duties that can be artificially imposed upon him? The duties of an office are duties prescribed by law. The President may have this or that to do; he may have much to do or he may have little.

The Constitution prescribes the powers and duties which he now has. An amendment to the Constitution could abridge or enlarge them, could qualify or direct or limit him in the exercise of these or other functions, but it is beyond the power of constitution maker or lawgiver, it is beyond the power of mortal man, to give to any man born of woman the power of Infinity, of Omniscience itself. Official duties prescribed by human instrumentality change with legislation or change with constitutions, and yet, as a matter of fact or a matter of law, is it possible for an officer to be always, from induction into office until he leaves the office, engaged in the performance of his official functions? I think stating the proposition merely, without argument, furnishes answer and refutation complete and ample.

Then I assume that there can be a time, that there is a time, that there are many times, that much of the time, neither the President nor any other officer is engaged in the performance of his official duties. If that were not true, these limitations which went into the legislation with reference to officers in general, and the interference with them in the discharge of their official duties—went into the law in the early days of our country, when the Constitution was new and fresh from the hands of its makers—certainly would not have gone in. They would have been and would be unnecessary.

What reason is there for concluding that the President is always engaged in the discharge of his duties and that a justice of the Supreme Court is not always engaged in the discharge of his duties? What reason for concluding that the justice of the Supreme Court is always engaged in the discharge of his official duties, but that the judge of the court of appeals is not always so engaged? And so we could pass down the line. It is a presumption against human nature; it is a presumption that does violence to all our experience and observation and all the facts in the case.

I take it that this saving clause does not save anything: that necessarily, inevitably, there are times, and there must be times, when no mortal man is or can be engaged in the discharge of official duties.

Then, coming to the former part of section 13 again, here is a presumption that at the time of the particular offense, the time of the particular homicide, the officer is or was engaged in the discharge of his official duties. It may be or it may not be so. It is the material fact whether it is or is not so. Certainly there are times when he is engaged in the discharge of his official duties and there are times when he is not.

Take another branch of this, where the presumption amounts to more, and where the objection to it—constitutional objection I mean—seems to me to be clearer and more forcible—that an offense was committed on account of something done or something not done officially—presumed to have been so committed. It may be that there can not be a bit of evidence upon that subject. The offense may have been committed under such circumstances, with such surroundings, by such a person, as that there can not be any evidence upon the subject; that no man except the offender himself can know, and yet here is the presumption. Now, why? Why, in order to help out this jurisdiction?

It seems to me that section 13 ought to go out. It may be a long, long time—God knows that all hope it will be, that none of us will ever live to see the time—when this law, whatever it may be, shall be brought into play. Then, again, it may not be so long, but however it may be, since we are legislating here upon the matter, since we are trying to deal with it as lawyers, let us, if we can, deal with it correctly.

I do not believe that this legislation ought to cover as many officers as are embraced in it, or that it ought to apply to the representatives of foreign governments. What reason is there for making this apply to the representative of a foreign government? It does not apply to our own legislators; it does not apply to our own judiciary; it does not apply to the loftiest and best of the manhood of our nation. Why should it apply to those representatives of foreign governments, great or small?

The suggestion was made here in this debate that you can not draw a line of distinction between them; that you ought to have your law cover and protect and apply to the representative of the tiniest republic in the world as well as to the representative of the mightiest monarchy. I think that is a correct proposition; but why ought it to apply to any of them, to take them out of the class, in our own land here, in which seventy-odd million people are placed? Is it necessary for their protection? On the contrary, the very singling out of them, the very specifying of them, the very fact of making a law peculiarly for them, in contradistinction to millions of others, increases the dangers which may surround them. They are far safer in the body of our citizenship, they are far safer protected by the general laws which apply to all our people.

Take these officers in the remote succession. This legislation is predicated upon the theory that the Government receives a fatal blow, or a blow of such tremendous importance that there should be special legislation about it, only when a Chief Executive or somebody down a considerable line of succession is killed. This line of succession may by legislation be made much longer. It might be made to extend through a horde of officers, who would be put under this special legislation. Now, I do not think that is a wise thing.

I do not think the title of this bill is in keeping with what is in the bill itself. I do not really estimate it to be what its title states it to be—a bill for the protection of the President. It is a bill to give the Federal courts jurisdiction of offenses committed against the President and certain other persons on account of their official character. It is for the conferring of jurisdiction upon a Federal court, and it is for the punishment of certain offenders. I think the title is a misnomer. That, however, is a trifling thing.

A good deal has been said about a sentiment abroad in the country in favor of legislation upon this subject. That sentiment is in favor of legislation to protect the President, to make more difficult and more improbable and, if such a thing could be, impossible such shocking tragedies as three times have occurred in our history, the Chief Executive each time being the victim of the assassin's malice or blindness or fury or madness. But really, as to the effect of the legislation proposed, in my judgment it will prove neither particularly good nor particularly bad.

Inasmuch as there seems to be a demand for some legislation, although I do not believe it is necessary, for there is ample and complete jurisdiction, Federal and State, and a full body of laws in all the States, and complete jurisdiction and full provision of law where the United States have supreme and exclusive control, yet I am disposed to yield to that general sentiment so far as to vote for a new measure, providing it does not contain provisions which seem to me to be thoroughly objectionable, and so objectionable as to warrant me in the exercise of my judgment in voting against it. Section 13 is one of these provisions.

Now, I believe I have said all I care to say on this point. To sum it up, I believe it is necessary in order to give jurisdiction to the Federal courts over homicides in the States, to have some such qualifying words as are in this House bill. I do not believe that legislation such as the Senate bill, such as that advocated by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS] and the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER], simply providing for Federal jurisdiction and punishment by Federal courts of offenses because committed against some official, is constitutional.

I believe these qualifying words are necessary. Being necessary, I believe it is also necessary to charge their substance in an indictment and necessary to prove it. Reaching that conclusion, I believe section 13, which provides for presuming that which it is necessary to prove, presuming it against the accused, who is entitled to the benefit of a reasonable doubt, entitled to due process of law, and to trial according to the general forms and principles of the common law, is unconstitutional.

There is one other thing that I will mention just in passing, that has been commented upon somewhat, and that is the question as to whether a person tried in a Federal court and there acquitted could be tried again in a State court for, and convicted of, this offense, or if tried in a State court and acquitted, whether he could be convicted in a Federal court.

If the first indictment be a good indictment, and the defendant pleads to it, is tried and acquitted in a court of competent jurisdiction, can he be tried again in the other jurisdiction? It is suggested that there are two jurisdictions and that there is an offense against each. But is that true in the sense in which there can be two trials and two punishments? I think not. At least, I am inclined to that belief.

Now take the case of an assault on a mail carrier while engaged in the discharge of his duty. There are two offenses—there is no question about that. The offender can be prosecuted, and rightfully prosecuted, and convicted in the Federal court for interfering with and obstructing a Federal officer in the discharge of his duty.

Now, then, the same man can be indicted, tried, and convicted in a State court for breaking the peace, for bodily injury inflicted.

Mr. LANHAM. That is distinctly held in the case of Cruikshanks v. The United States.

Mr. DE ARMOND (continuing). For assault committed upon this individual. But suppose he kills him? Suppose the minor offenses are merged into the greater offense, summed up and swallowed up in the great capital offense of homicide, of murder. He is tried for murder; he is tried for homicide; he is tried upon a good indictment. When you try him again, what do you try him for? Of what do you convict him? You do not convict him of obstructing the mail carrier or the President in the discharge of his official duties. You convict him of killing the officer. He has committed that offense.

In each court a homicide, the same homicide, is charged against the accused. Can it be possible that he can be tried twice for that homicide, once acquitted and once convicted, without being twice in jeopardy for the same offense? Can one murder be divided into two murders by the simple process of charging the accused in one case with the crime of murdering A and charging in the other case with murdering the same identical A—the Haitian minister to the United States?

Mr. GILBERT. As demonstrating the fact in just such a case, I want to call the gentleman's attention to these words in the seventh amendment to the Federal Constitution:

> No fact tried by a jury shall be otherwise reexamined in any court of the United States than according to the rules of common law.

That applies, of course, to the Federal courts. If the jury impaneled had the proof before them and the issues had been disposed of by the jury, before either State or Federal court, can the same issue be made?

Mr. DE ARMOND. I think not. Now, it seems to me that this bill ought to be made constitutional. It is to be hoped, all of us sincerely hope, that the time will never come again in the history of our country when this law, or a law like this, or any laws that are now on our statute books, or any proposed new law need be invoked on account of a crime committed against the President, the Vice-President, or any officer mentioned in this bill.

If the time ever comes, I have every reason to believe that the offender will be tried, convicted, and punished. There is such a general, such a universal reprobation in the American mind everywhere, rising above every sentiment and every division of thought, of sect, creed, or section against this offense, such an absolute abhorrence, such a disposition to enforce and observe the law, such a determination to punish such violations of law, that there is no danger, whether this law be passed or not, that any such offense, if anybody ever commits such an offense again, will escape punishment.

Then, if a law is to be made which gives the Federal courts jurisdiction of crimes committed in the States, let it be such a law, if the time ever does come, that it will not defeat the trial of such a man in a State or Federal court. As I said, there is such a general disapprobation of the crime, such a law-abiding spirit in our people, that it may be relied upon to punish the offender, and if there be a possibility of escape for the criminal it is through just such a conflict as may arise between such statutes as this will be if put upon the statute books and the existing laws of the States and our Constitution.

Take section 13 out of it and the unconstitutional part of it, I think, has gone. Take your section 13 out of it, amend it so as to leave the ambassador, whether he represents a great government or a small one, to the protection of the laws, State and national, which for more than a century have been, and which for another century and another century will be, ample for his protection. Make this, if you please, a law to reach the President and the Vice-President. If I had my way, I would go no further down the line. Put the law into this shape, and it seems to me, if it does no good it will do no harm. It can not be assailed, as I think this House bill can, for unconstitutionality. [Applause.]

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to discuss the constitutional questions involved in the pending bill.

I do desire, however, to lay stress upon the necessity of a Federal law which shall make it a crime to kill or attempt to kill the President of the United States or those in the line of Presidential succession; which shall make anarchy a crime; and which shall restrain the immigration of anarchists to this country so far as may be.

The killing of William McKinley as a citizen of Ohio, or as a temporary resident of any State, would be a crime against the laws of that State, but the killing of a President, because he is President, and because of the Government which he represents, is a crime against government and ought to be so punished.

Czolgosz assaulted the President because he represented organized society, not because of any personal grudge against him.

This kind of impersonal crime and abstract deviltry is called anarchy.

There are two kinds of anarchy, it appears. One would dissolve society in blood and inaugurate the reign of every man for himself; the other would rescind the social contract by mutual consent and everybody would be so good as to need no law. One would be hell; the other would be the millenium, and both are at present impossible.

Any man who hates organized government enough to be willing to die in order to strike at it, even though he knows it will go on as though nothing had happened, must be animated by fanaticism or a most bitter hatred.

Men like Czolgosz are in part and in varying degree the emotional and unreasonable results of hereditary hatred of Old World governmental oppression.

In their blood runs the transmitted horror of Siberia, the hatred of the government of which Siberia is a part, and the inherited memory of Polish national extinction; of centuries of robbery under forms of law; of taxation to support states which give nothing in return; of hatred of privileged classes.

These men or their ancestors came here from conditions of spiritual, moral, and material degradation. They came here from hovels of filth to find American homes, from foul food to healthful plenty. They came as emigrant subjects to take their place as American citizens.

The angel of liberty has never visited them before. It would be strange if they knew how to entertain her.

Our language is unknown to them at first. Our institutions are unknown to them. Free speech, free press, personal liberty, the right of public meeting, and the enjoyment of private property are at first incomprehensible to them.

Generations of oppression have corroded and distorted them. They bear the scars in mind and body of ancient wrongs.

And so we see cropping out here and there products whose blood harks back to ages of oppression, who are born with the instinct of opposition to organized society, who minimize its benefits and magnify its wrongs; in whom the hereditary hatred of all government slumbering in an ill-balanced brain needs only the words of a woman like Goldman to fan it into frenzy.

Such minds are fanatically predisposed against all governmental and individual prosperity. They see wealth about them, but do not understand that it is the wealth of labor grown prosperous.

They see men above them in official places, but do not perceive that office is conferred by the free will of a free people, and that the man who rises from the ranks to serve the public for a time must return to the ranks from whence he came. Their dream of Utopia is to destroy society and sit around among its ruins.

Assume that out of a population of 76,000,000 there are a few minds in this condition. Then there comes on a political campaign and demagogues go out and preach the doctrine of discontent and scatter firebrands from the rear platforms of special cars for political purposes.

These men lie about their country, about their Government, and about its purposes. They enlarge symptons into diseases; make health seem tottering invalidism; make opportunity seem departing; make capitalists feel like apologizing for having a dollar ahead; make an employer seem like a despot; make a factory seem like an inquisition, where labor is ground in the cogs of capital; make honest labor seem like vassalage; make honest sweat seem a badge of servitude; make hypocrites think themselves genuine and cranks extra-enlightened citizens; cause the emotional to dimly hear the rumblings of the end of the world, and finally arm discontent with the torch and ax.

In this they are aided and abetted by the kind of journalism which abuses the liberty of the press; which smirches and ruins innocent reputations; which considers public men fair targets for wanton lies; which seldom tells the truth unless the truth is sufficiently sensational; which caricatures public men until the beasts that die are respectable compared with them; which make public office a den of thieves, dividing their loot pilfered from a suffering people; which print for sale and not for benefit, and the wider the sale the wider the broadcast of evil suggestion; which, instead of educating the people upward, is a literary drab, selling itself for a price to all manner of mental uncleanness.

If any of the Ten Commandments are of binding force, all are of binding force; therefore if it is an offense to kill, it is an offense to bear false witness.

These things plow the ground and sow the dragon's teeth of anarchy which spring up in men like Czolgosz, with knives and revolvers in their hands and a mania in their brains to kill.

There is no sharpening of the dagger of the oppressed upon the tombstones of martyrs in this country. There have been no martyrs of governmental oppression in this country. Anarchy here is in no sense the product of American conditions, but a growth transplanted from abroad.

In a limited monarchy a king acts in a defined way. In an absolute monarchy he acts as he pleases. Here no man does as he pleases in his public relations unless he pleases to do right.

Here public opinion rules. It towers above legislatures, Congresses, governors, and Presidents. Here Presidents and legislatures are the agents of the people who call them up and call them down.

The public opinion of Russia, Germany, Italy, France, and England is the opinion of a privileged class. Here there is no privileged class; there is no lower class; there is no middle class, and there is no peasantry.

We are all common citizens of one common country, jointly interested in its welfare.

We recruit our temporary rulers from the common walks of life.

We doff our hats to no king We make our own laws and rule our own political destinies.

"Nowhere does the individual associate himself more constantly and directly with the greatness of the nation."

Time and again in our history have we demonstrated this. A boy is born on a 40-acre farm of poor, obscure, and perhaps illiterate parents. He goes to school at the common school and finishes perhaps at a high school in his nearest town. From sheer necessity he makes his way, the very struggle strengthening him until at last he heads a business, heads his profession, heads his State or his nation.

The avenues upward in this country start at no upper class or middle class; they run to the uttermost parts of the Republic, even unto the doors of abject poverty.

Why try to destroy government? The evolution of society has been from chaos through feudalism and free cities up to government of the people, by the people.

Why obliterate the work of centuries? Natural man in the exercise of his natural rights took what he found, and it was his while he retained it. The shade of the tree and the fruit thereof were his while he waited.

The ground was common property, but as mankind increased in number, craft, and ambition this became no longer possible. No man would sow without the hope of harvest, and no man would build for everybody.

There are two kinds of anarchy, the anarchy of evolution and the anarchy of revolution.

With the anarchy of evolution which hopes for the evolution of man to the point where he will be so just as to need no government, we need not trouble ourselves. Its consummation is a long way off.

The anarchy of revolution proposes the killing of rulers till men will no longer dare to become rulers.

But suppose that were possible. The forces that had destroyed government would turn and rend each other. Instead of the tyranny of government there would ensue the tyranny of crime. After the fall of law and order would ensue the reign of terror, and out of the reign of terror would ride the man on horseback.

As out of the chaos of the dark ages feudalism rose, so out of disorder centers of power would appear conquering the weaker on the margin of a constantly increasing circle of power till nations should appear again.

Without fault of his own, William McKinley was sacrificed to the propaganda of impersonal murder.

He had moved slowly up the way to power which his fellowmen had by successive stages opened to him. He had never seized anything by craft or force. If any man of modern times has walked with God William McKinley did.

He neither embodied in himself nor represented repressive tendencies. He was one of the people. He stood for the people. His highest aim was his country's good, and his daily life was an example and inspiration to upright living.

Such a President heading such a Government furnishes no pretext even to the most fanatical opponent of organized government unless it be upon the theory that the best forms of government ought to be struck down so that humanity may the sooner revert to confusion where "They shall take who have power and they shall keep who can."

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I have read this bill with considerable attention, and I find nothing in the bill which is, in my opinion, either unconstitutional or undemocratic, and I am reputed to be a strict constructionist of the straightest sect. About all that the bill does can be stated in one sentence: It makes the punishment uniform throughout the United States, and it vests jurisdiction in the Federal courts.

I see no objection in vesting jurisdiction for the crime described in this bill in the Federal courts. On the contrary, I do see very much objection to leaving the governmental agencies of one sovereignty to be protected by the judicial agencies of another, or leaving to one sovereignty the duty of punishing those who have obstructed the officers of an independent sovereignty in the conduct of their official duties. As a State's Rights Democrat, I say this: I would not consent that the crime of obstructing by death the governor of Mississippi in the performance of his duty should be tried for it elsewhere than in a Mississippi court.

Mr. Chairman, there are especially two clauses in this bill that I very heartily indorse. There are some things in it that I would rather have seen a bit otherwise. For example, I wish the bill had stopped with the President and Vice-President instead of going all down the line of Presidential succession under the statute. But the constitutional power down the line is just as full as it is to the extent of including the Vice-President. I also wish that in section 11 the words "who disbelieves in or" were omitted, so that it would read "that no person who is opposed to all organized government," etc., instead of saying "who disbelieves in or is opposed to all organized government," thus entering into the inner arcana of a man's intellectual intentions, as the bill appears to try to do.

However, that amounts to very little, for unless there has been some overt act of expression to indicate the intention there can be no proof of its existence. I am especially pleased to find section 11 and section 12 in the bill, because I do not believe that anybody who professes "opposition to all organized government"—the instrumentality and the means of civilization on earth—ought to be permitted to enter into this country, which he is forbidden to do under section 11, or to be naturalized if he should have entered, as is forbidden in section 12.

Mr. LANHAM. May I state to the gentleman from Mississippi that that portion of the bill had the unanimous approval of the committee?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The gentleman from Texas says that that section has the unanimous approbation of the committee, and I am glad to hear that. Now, I was interested somewhat in the argument of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND]. There is no acuter intellect, no better lawyer, in this House, as far as I know, but I think the gentleman has made some mistake in his exposition to-day. It is not an uncommon thing for a law to say just what this law says, that something "shall be presumed until the contrary is proved," etc. Why, there is hardly a State in the Union, for example, having prohibition laws where it is not provided that when the proof of the fact of sale has been made, the presumption shall be that the sale was unlawful unless it is otherwise established. I do not see that that cuts any figure; it is a presumption of fact, and each case is left to rest upon its own bottom, according to the facts surrounding it.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Certainly.

Mr. DE ARMOND. In the instance the gentleman has cited and under similar instances, is it not true that the presumption is a declaration of the general principles and that the person who is to rebut the presumption has the means to rebut it, provided the fact is not against him; for instance, the fact of selling the liquor?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Undoubtedly, and that is true here.

Mr. DE ARMOND. No.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Yes, it is; and I can prove it by reading the proposed section.

SEC. 13. That in all prosecutions under the provisions of the first seven sections of this act it shall be presumed, until the contrary is proved, that the President of the United States, or Vice-President of the United States, or other officer of the United States entitled by law to succeed to the Presidency, as the case may be, was, at the time of the commission of the alleged offense, engaged in the performance of his official duties.

And then there follows this language:

Nothing in this act contained shall be construed as an admission or declaration that there is a time when either of such officers, during the tenure of his office, is not engaged in the performance of his official duties.

In other words, the fact is left to be determined by the jury, according to the circumstances of each case; and the words are taken in their ordinary intendment—in the meaning in which they are ordinarily used.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I will ask the gentleman whether there is not this very broad distinction—that in the case he has cited, the charge of the unlawful sale of liquor—the general proposition is that within a given territory the sale of liquor is unlawful.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Well, I will take another case. What is the ordinary common-law presumption in case you kill me or I kill you? The presumption is that the killing was done with malice; and the person who commits the act is left to show, if he can, that it was done justifiably. If there is nothing before the court but the killing, the accused is guilty of murder. Here there is no question of unlawfulness in a given territory, but a broad question of felonious intent.

Mr. DE ARMOND. That rests upon the same proposition. The killing is unlawful (just as the sale of liquor is unlawful) if there is nothing shown except the killing.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The killing of a President is unlawful, and done "because he was President," if nothing is shown except that he was President and was killed.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Exactly; but the question whether the person killed is the President, whether he was acting as President, whether the killing was because of something he did or did not do, is another question.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Then there comes another point; and upon that I ask to be heard very briefly. On this point again, I think the gentleman from Missouri has made a mistake. As I understood him a moment ago, he said that the charge in each case is the homicide. Well, it is true that the homicide is a part of the charge in each case; but it is not true that under this bill the charge is simply homicide. The charge is a different offense altogether. The charge is the homicide of a man "because" he is President or Vice-President or the incumbent of any of these other offices, or "while he was engaged in the performance" of his official duties or "because of his official character" or "because of any of his official acts or omissions;" and the punishment is meted out upon the proof of this statutory offense. It is murder, but a peculiar murder, herein defined and herein made a special and distinct offense.

Now, suppose a man were arrested and tried on the charge of killing a man named A "because A was President of the United States;" and suppose it should be shown that he killed A, not because he was President of the United States, but because A had slapped his face or tried to kill him, or seduced his daughter, none of them being an act done in the performance of A's duty as President, as, of course, none of these acts could be. Now, let us suppose the man cleared upon that indictment, and suppose, then, he is indicted in a State court upon the plain, ordinary charge of murder—simply because he had killed A without any lawful reason—making it justifiable homicide. How could he plead that he had been autrefois acquit—formerly acquitted—upon the common-law charge of murder, against the peace and dignity of the State? He was formerly tried and committed upon the charge of murdering A because A was President of the United States, against the peace and dignity of the United States—a separate sovereignty—and he is now to be tried for simply murdering A, regardless of whether he was President of the United States or not, and against the peace and dignity of the State.

There are not only two separate states of fact constituting two separate offenses, but they require different character of proof to constitute the offense.

Moreover, one is an offense against one sovereignty, and hence properly triable in its courts, and the other a crime against another, a separate, and, in this regard, an independent sovereignty, and hence properly to be tried in its courts.

Suppose a man were arrested and tried in a United States court for "piracy on the high seas"—a crime against the laws of all nations—and were acquitted, and afterwards went to England and was arrested to be tried there. Could he plead in bar to the prosecution for the offense that he had been tried and acquitted and "once in jeopardy" in the United States?

Suppose a man guilty of waging war against both Massachusetts and the United States on Massachusetts soil, and hence guilty of treason against both sovereignties. If cleared on the charge of treason against Massachusetts would that protect him from indictment and trial for treason against the United States, or vice versa?

Mr. RAY of New York. If the gentleman from Mississippi will yield a moment, I would like to place in the RECORD in connection with the remarks he has just made the syllabus and some legal references in the case of Malinda Fox v. The State of Ohio, reported in 46 U. S. Reports (5 Howard), with Rapalje's Notes, page 410 et seq.

The syllabus is as follows:

The power conferred upon Congress by the fifth and sixth clauses of the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States, viz, "To coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin, and fix the standard of weights and measures;" "To provide for the punishment of counterfeiting the securities and current coin of the United States," does not prevent a State from passing a law to punish the offense of circulating counterfeit coin of the United States.[1]

The two offenses of counterfeiting the coin and passing counterfeit money are essentially different in their characters. The former is an offense directly against the Government, by which individuals may be affected; the latter is a private wrong, by which the Government may be remotely, if it will in any degree be reached.[2]

The prohibitions contained in the amendments to the Constitution were intended to be restrictions upon the Federal Government and not upon the authority of the States.[3]

The notes are as follows:

[1] Followed: Moore v. Illinois, 14 How., 20 (but see Id., 21). Cited, Passenger Cases, 7 How., 556. (See Ex parte Houghton, 8 Fed. Rep., 898, 902; s. c. 7 Id., 659; United States v. Yates, 6 Id., 864; Dashing v. State, 78 Ind., 358; State v. Oleson, 26 Minn., 517.)

United States v. Field, 16 Fed. Rep., 778; Brown v. Evans, 8 Sawy., 493.

In Fox v. State the court arrived at the conclusion that the State punished one offense and the United States another, and therefore there was no conflict of authority. Other cases are of the same kind. Commonwealth v. Tenney, 97 Mass., 50. Other cases are put upon the express ground that the act of Congress expressly permitted State courts to punish the crime for which the criminal was prosecuted. Commonwealth v. Fuller, 8 Metc. (Mass.), 313. The permit was held constitutional. In several other State courts parties were indicted for offenses relating to the current coin of the United States, and no exception was taken to the jurisdiction. Peek v. State, 2 Humph. (Tenn.), 78; Rosnick v. Commonwealth, 2 Va. Cas., 356; State v. Collins, 2 Hawks (N. C.), 191; State v. Bowman, 6 V. T., 594; Miller v. People, 2 Scam. (Ill.), 233; Rouse v. State, 4 Ga., 136. Some cases expressly put it that such acts are unconstitutional, because Congress having express power to punish counterfeiting, no State can legislate upon the subject. Mattison v. State, 3 Mo., 421.

Other cases hold that it is an offense against two jurisdictions, and each may punish it (Chess v. State, 1 Blackf. (Ind.), 198); that the power to punish such an offense is inherent in the State to protect her citizens. State v. Tutt, 2 Bail. (S. C.), 44; State v. Antonio, 2 S. C. (O. S.), 776; People v. White, 34 Cal., 183; State v. McPherson, 9 Iowa, 53; Jett v. Commonwealth, 18 Gratt. (Va.), 933; State v. Brown, 2 Oreg., 221; Sizemore v. State, 3 Head. (Tenn.), 26; State v. Antonio, 3 Brev. (S. C.), 562; Sutton v. State, 9 Ohio, 133; State v. Pitman, 1 Brev. (S. C.), 32; Henrick v. Commonwealth, 5 Leight. And perhaps a party who steals money out of mail bags may be punished under the United States laws for violating the postal laws, and under the State laws for theft. United States v. Amy, 14 Md., 149-152.

The indictment must charge the offense as one against the State and not against the United States. Harlan v. People (1 Doug., Mich., 207.) In Massachusetts it is held that since the passage of the act of Congress punishing national-bank officers for embezzlement, an accessory to such embezzlement by an officer of such national bank can not be indicted for a felony under the State law, even though he is not indictable in the Federal court. Commonwealth v. Felton (101 Mass., 204). So, in the United States district court of Vermont, it was decided that the Federal courts had exclusive jurisdiction over the offense of passing counterfeit national-bank bills, and where a person was imprisoned by a State court on a charge of such an offense a writ of habeas corpus would be issued to release him. The case of People v. Kelly was one of perjury committed to obtain a land patent, and it was held that the offense could not be punished in the State court. To the same effect are other cases. The gentleman will find by the notes that there have been 150 or 200 cases in the Supreme Court of the United States and in the State courts, holding exactly the view which the gentleman from Mississippi states.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Why, sir, this is, in the broad outline, a matter of familiar law learning. Referring again to the liquor case, suppose, for example, a man is indicted in the State of Mississippi for "violating the prohibition laws" of Yazoo County. Suppose the accused makes the defense that the vote upon the prohibition law was not valid; that prohibition was never made the law in Yazoo County. Suppose upon that ground he is acquitted, and that he is then arrested and tried upon the charge of "unlawfully retailing vinous and spiritous liquors," of course he can be convicted if he can show no license to sell liquor, although the prohibition law may be invalid. Now, it is true the fact of selling liquor is the fact to be inquired into in each case; but it does not constitute the offense to be inquired into, because in the one case the fact of selling the liquor was urged to have taken place contrary to a prohibition law, and in the other case it was urged to have taken place unlawfully because the selling was without a license.

And so, in this case, the fact of the killing is the gravamen of each offense in a certain sense, but in one case it is simply the fact of having killed A without lawful authority and in the other it is having unlawfully killed A because A was President of the United States. Now, then, what harm does this presumption do? Czolgosz killed Mr. McKinley in the State of New York. Under this law, if it had been in operation, he could have been indicted for this offense—the statutory offense hereby created. He could have come into court, let us say, and could have plead that he did not kill him "because he was President of the United States," but for a private reason, but the presumption of law as declared by this act would have been that he did kill him "because," etc., or "while," etc.

Then the burden of proof would have shifted, and it would have become incumbent upon him to show that he had some other reason or motive. Now, his mere say so would not establish it, although it would be competent testimony, and if itself unrebutted by evidence, direct or circumstantial, would prevail. He could have been heard himself to swear that that was not his motive, but when the facts were developed to the effect that he had never been even acquainted with William McKinley as a man, that he had never met him in his life, that there was no possibility of any personal grudge or personal reason, his testimony would have been disbelieved by the jury; so the presumption can be rebutted, and it can be rebutted in the way in which every other prima facie case defined by law can be rebutted, namely, by the testimony of the witness, by the testimony of other witnesses, or by circumstances.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlemen permit an interruption?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Now, the instances the gentleman has given by which he has illustrated his facts as to the whisky case he will admit, as a matter of course, are all, under the criminal law, in the nature of police regulations.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I do; but I do not admit that the illustrations I gave about murder are within the police regulations.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Does the gentleman not admit, whenever he refers to police regulations, that the criminal law is very different from what it is in the matters and rules of homicide?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I do.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Now, the gentleman is using the police regulation where a man is charged in one instance with violation of the police regulation and is brought forward and tried again, that for that reason under this bill a man can be tried twice by the Federal and State courts, when he has once been acquitted.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Yes; and for that very reason, when the gentleman from Missouri interrupted me and proceeded to argue that case, that fact had occurred to me and I suggested the other analogy of the common-law rule concerning murder, which is the malicious and premeditated killing of a human being in life; and that is not a police regulation, but is a matter of felony, just as this would be.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Does the gentleman regard it necessary under this bill to allege that the person killed is an officer and in the discharge of his duty, or was killed because he did something or did not do something officially?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Undoubtedly, in order to constitute this statutory offense.

Mr. DE ARMOND. It is necessary to give jurisdiction.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I think so.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Does the gentleman think that a matter which it is necessary to allege in an indictment, which is essential to give jurisdiction, can be presumed against a man in a criminal case?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Yes; in the intendment of this bill, i. e., if certain facts are first proved, for example, that A was President and was killed. It is not only essential to give jurisdiction, but the gentleman must remember that it is also essential to constitute the statutory offense.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I stated that.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. And it is upon that subject that I am now speaking.

Mr. DE ARMOND. What I am asking the gentleman—he misunderstood my question—is, If it is jurisdictional, absolutely necessary to be alleged, that which must be established to constitute guilt under this particular law, can it be presumed against a man?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Yes; provided it is also necessary to be proven in order to constitute the offense as well as to give jurisdiction and provided certain facts on which the presumption is based, and deemed sufficient to base it on, are first proved.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Then, if it is jurisdictional alone, it can not be presumed. If it is necessary to be proven, but is not proven, it can not be presumed, but if it is necessary to be both, for jurisdiction and conviction, it can be presumed.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Of course you might state it that way if you choose and it amuses you to do so, but in this instance it is not a case of jurisdiction; it is a case of the constitution of the offense. The offense itself is put by another clause of the bill within the jurisdiction of the Federal courts, but the thing that constitutes the offense is the "killing of A because A is President of the United States," or "while," etc.

If proved to be President, and killed while President, it is simply presumed, until shown to the contrary, that he was killed "while engaged in the performance of official duties"—a natural and not violent presumption and one which is made prima facie only and capable of rebuttal.

Of course, in order to convict, the jury must believe beyond a reasonable doubt that the imputed presumption is not rebutted either by evidence or lack of evidence, giving the benefit of every reasonable doubt to the prisoner. I believe that the presumption would have existed as a presumption of fact without any express provision in the bill, but growing out of the very nature of the offense defined and created. The thing that constitutes the offense is the "killing of A while engaged in the performance of his official duty," or the "killing of A because of his official act," or of some official omission. In other words, the statutory offense is defined there, and then later on, after the offense has been created and defined, another section of the bill gives jurisdiction to the Federal court for the trial of that offense.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have said about all I want to say, except this: That I agree with what a great many other gentlemen have said to the effect that this bill ought to be considered with a view to the future, and not because of any feeling aroused by the past.

Mr. McDERMOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. McDERMOTT. The crime as described in this bill, if my recollection serves me rightly, is murder in the first degree in every State in the Union. Killing the President, in accordance with the provisions of this bill, would be murder in the first degree in every State in the Union, whether the degrees of murder are fixed there by common law or by statute. Now, one being indicted for the murder of the President under a State law and acquitted would necessarily be acquitted of having done the things provided for in this bill. Could he then be tried under Federal jurisdiction? The contra proposition does not follow. One might be acquitted of having done the thing provided in this bill and yet be guilty of murder in the first degree under the common law or under the statute usually providing for malice, etc. But as the provisions of this bill are but a definition of murder in the first degree, as that crime is defined in every State in the Union, would not an acquittal within a State necessarily be an acquittal of having done the things described in this bill?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The offense here charged, as defined in the bill, would not necessarily be murder in the first degree in any State in the Union.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a suggestion to the gentleman from New Jersey and the gentleman from Mississippi, that the definition of the crime in the first section of this bill is not the definition of murder in the first degree in any State in the Union.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. No.

Mr. McDERMOTT. No.

Mr. CLARK. It would be manslaughter in Missouri, and I suppose manslaughter in New Jersey. I take it that they run about parallel. Now, the essence of murder in the first degree is malice.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Malice aforethought.

Mr. CLARK. Malice aforethought, premeditation, deliberation, and so on; but under this first section it just simply says that anybody who unlawfully, purposely, and knowingly kills the President of the United States, and so forth. That would be manslaughter.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. We expressly eliminated the premeditation.

Mr. CLARK. It would be simple manslaughter in any State in the Union. It would not even be murder in the second degree.

Mr. McDERMOTT. My idea of the bill runs with my question, and I do not agree with the gentleman from Missouri that if a man in Missouri or any other State did what is described in this section that he would be guilty simply of manslaughter. I take it that in every State in the Union a man who unlawfully, purposely, and knowingly kills a human being is guilty of murder in the first degree.

Mr. CLARK. Oh, no.

Mr. McDERMOTT. That has been my theory.

Mr. TOMPKINS of Ohio. There must be premeditation.

Mr. McDERMOTT. If the killing was purposely, knowingly, and unlawfully, it would be charged that there was malice aforethought.

Mr. CLARK. Oh, no. Suppose, for instance, that in any State of the Union the gentleman from New Jersey and myself were to get into an argument, and the argument waxed hot——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. And proceeded to blows.

Mr. CLARK. And I should slap the gentleman from New Jersey in the face, and he should pull out a knife and stick it in me and kill me, the very worst you could possibly make out of it in any State would be manslaughter in a very low degree.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. And yet it would be "unlawfully, knowingly, and purposely" done. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have not attempted to make any speech on the subject. I just wanted to say that I am very glad, as far as I am concerned, that the members of the Judiciary Committee were sufficiently self-contained not to be carried away by the popular excitement and general feeling of outrage aroused by Mr. McKinley's assassination and that they did not bring into this House a bill which was unconstitutional or which was undemocratic or unrepublican in its form. I am very glad and I think the country is to be congratulated on our having a bill which we can support without violating the Constitution or the spirit of American institutions.

One further word. It has been urged that the provision for the protection of foreign ambassadors should not have been included, that there is no more reason why we should protect a foreign ambassador than the ordinary citizen. I do not agree with that view. I think that there are great international reasons why we should be especially careful in protecting those who are guests "within our gates," representatives of sovereignties who have been invited to send them here. Macbeth, himself, even when he came to consider the death of King Duncan, said he was doubly bound not to slay him, and one reason why he ought to be "strong against the deed" was because he was "his host, who should against his murderer shut the door," because Duncan was a guest within his own household. I think we are charged with a greater degree of carefulness, if possible, in taking care of those men who come to us upon our own invitation as the authorized agents and representatives of sovereignties and peoples of this world than we are in taking care of myself, for example, or the gentleman from Missouri.

Now, I want to say this, that if there ever was an occasion that would have excusably excited the people to proceed beyond the limits of their constitutional power and beyond the limits to which they ordinarily would have gone, it was the occasion of the assassination of Mr. McKinley. I do not know of one single solitary political matter upon which he and I ever agreed, but it has afforded me very much pleasure very many times to say that a more courteous, well-bred, genial, cultured human being I had never met. So that when he was taken off in the manner in which he was taken off, it was to be expected that, faced with "the deep damnation of his taking off," the people might go too far in requiring and Congress in enacting legislation, in a spirit of revenge as well as for the prevention of like evils and crimes in the future; and I think we ought to thank the Judiciary Committee for the fact that it has been cool-headed enough not to have gone to the extreme to which the Senate in its bill went, to which a great many members of the House would in this respect have gone—to the extreme, I will say, that all of us felt like going for quite a little while after that dastardly crime was committed. [Loud applause.]

Mr. RAY of New York. I now yield six minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW].

Mr. GROW. Mr. Chairman, the President is the executive officer, to execute the powers of the Government, as conferred upon him by the Constitution and the laws made in pursuance thereof. From the time he is inaugurated to the close of his term he is in the discharge of his duty as executive officer, for he is liable at any moment to be called upon to execute any of its duties.

I would have the crime of the person killing the President stamped by law as a crime above all other crimes against a human being under our laws as the most effectual method to stamp out the spirit of anarchy, and I would have all accessories made principals in the crime. Treason has no degrees of punishment. Any person who could be convicted as accessory in ordinary crimes I would make a principal, in the unlawful killing of the President. I would not have imprisonment as a penalty for anyone aiding or abetting the killing of the President. Why should the citizens of a government furnish a home, even in prison, for anyone who is opposed to all governments and who believes in assassination for their overthrow.

The idea I desire to express is that the Executive of the United States while in office represents all the powers of the Government as conferred by the Constitution, and whoever takes his life unlawfully strikes a blow at the sovereignty of the nation the same as if it was done by an act of treason. Millions of men have stood upon the battlefield in warding off such assaults by instant death to all such assailants.

Anarchists who would overthrow all governments by assassination in striking down their chief executive officers should all be classed as principals when it is proven in any way that they abetted the crime. Such punishment would not be in violation of any principle of the Constitution. I would stamp by law the unlawful killing of the President any time during his term of office as the greatest crime that could be committed against a human being under the jurisdiction of the Constitution of the United States. [Loud applause.]

Mr. RAY of New York. Now I yield twenty minutes, and more, if necessary, to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER].

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. CONNER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 11599. An act to redivide the district of Alaska into three recording and judicial divisions; and

H. R. 14380. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across Waccamaw River at Conway, in the State of South Carolina, by Conway and Seashore Railroad Company.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills and joint resolution of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 5212. An act granting to the State of California 640 acres of land in lieu of section 16, township 7 south, range 8 east, San Bernardino meridian, State of California, now occupied by the Torros band or village of Mission Indians;

S. 909. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to extend the free-delivery system of the Post-Office Department, and for other purposes," approved January 3, 1887;

S. 679. An act directing the issue of a check in lieu of a lost check drawn by Capt. E. O. Fechét, disbursing officer United States Signal-Service Corps, in favor of the Bishop Gutta Percha Company;

S. 5968. An act to authorize the promotion and retirement of the present senior major-general of the Army; and

S. R. 110. Joint resolution empowering the State of Minnesota to file selections of indemnity school lands upon public lands in Minnesota otherwise undisposed of, after the survey thereof in the field and prior to the approval and filing of the plat of survey thereof.

PROTECTION OF THE PRESIDENT.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the chairman of the Judiciary Committee for the courtesy he has extended to me, because in the course of my remarks I shall offer some criticism upon the bill reported and so ably advocated by him. I had not intended to take any part in this debate, and therefore have not gone to any special pains to look up the questions involved in the bill. I am for some kind of legislation. I am for the best kind of legislation that can be devised for the protection of the life of the President of the United States and those who are in constitutional line of succession.

For more than a hundred years the Federal Government has depended upon the laws of the various States for the protection of the lives of its principal officers? It has depended upon incidental protection, and, in the main, that protection has been regarded as fairly sufficient. Three times during the history of the Republic the Chief Magistrate of the country has been stricken down by the hand of an assassin, and on each occasion the assassin paid the penalty of his crime with his life.

I can hardly conceive of conditions where the President could be assassinated in any of the States that the offender would not be visited with the full penalty of the law. But the fact referred to by the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] a few minutes ago, that one sovereignty ought not to be required to depend on the laws and the courts of another sovereignty for its own protection, is ample justification for the enactment of Federal legislation along the line of the pending bill. I have no doubt of the power of the Federal Government to pass laws that will protect its officers, not only in the discharge of their official duty, but that will protect officers as such, and will punish felonious assaults upon them at any time during their official term.

Our political system is somewhat complex. The Federal Government has its own functions and its own powers, and it is absolute and supreme within its sphere. The books are full of decisions holding that Congress has the power, that power is inherent in the Federal Government to enact all laws which are necessary to fully carry out all its granted powers. It has authority to enact all laws which are necessary to protect its own officials and maintain its own political integrity. I doubt if there is a gentleman in the sound of my voice who will question the doctrine, as a general proposition, that the Federal Government has inherent power to protect its official machinery and preserve it intact, whether that machinery be in operation or whether it be inactive for the time being.

I believe that Congress ought to pass a law along the line indicated by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW] in his brief remarks, to make it an offense to take the life of the President at any time during his constitutional term, without regard to where he may be or what he may be doing at the time the attack is made upon him. I have no doubt that Congress has ample authority to enact that kind of a law. It is based upon the inherent power in the Federal Government to preserve its political existence. I do not like the bill reported by the committee because its provisions are too narrow and circumscribed to be efficient. It makes it a crime to kill the President only while he is performing official duties or for some official act or omission or on account of his official character.

Mr. KLEBERG. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I will.

Mr. KLEBERG. If Congress has the power to do that with reference to the President, what distinction does the gentleman draw as to other officials, Supreme Court judges and judges of the other courts, the United States marshals or the revenue officers?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I make no constitutional distinction. I stand here to assert that the Federal Government is clothed with the power to punish the assassination of any of its officers, whether they are engaged in the discharge of official duties at the time of the attack or not.

If at the time he is assassinated the victim is an officer authorized to perform governmental functions, he is a part of the official machinery of the Government, and by his assassination the affairs of the Government have in some degree been obstructed.

Mr. KLEBERG. By such action would not Congress wipe out the line of demarcation that exists between the power of the Federal legislature and the State legislature? The State legislature passes laws for regulating the peace and order of the State, and Congress passes laws to prevent opposition to the authority of the Federal Government.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It does not wipe it out by any means. The Federal Government has its constitutional powers and it has its legal agencies to execute and carry on its political operations. The States have their powers and functions. Each occupies a different sphere of activity and each is supreme within its sphere.

When a conflict arises the Federal Government is supreme from the very necessities of the situation.

Mr. GROW. Mr. Chairman, I desire to interrupt the gentleman. The President is the only officer in this Government who is invested with all the powers of government by the Constitution and the laws made in pursuance thereof. All these other officers have a subsidiary duty to perform.

Mr. KLEBERG. But they are coordinate branches of the Government.

Mr. GROW. Wait; wait. I do not like this jumping in. [Laughter.] Now, any other officer of the Government has only limited powers granted to him.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That is true enough.

Mr. GROW. And his destruction can not delay the operation of Government. It is not a blow struck at the Government. A blow against the President of the United States is not only a blow against a man, but it is against the existence of the Republic itself; a blow at any other officer can not have that effect.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I appreciate the distinction made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but it only relates to the expediency of legislation. Those considerations address themselves to questions of policy only and not to questions of Federal power.

Mr. GROW. I grant that.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. There is a fundamental distinction between Federal functionaries. There are Federal officers and Federal employees as distinguished from officers. An officer is one who is clothed under the law with some of the powers of sovereignty, and when I use the term "officer" I use it in that sense. I simply assert that it is within the constitutional power of the Government to protect all of its officers, and to punish anyone who feloniously assaults them. This power is necessary to protect the official machinery and enable the Government to perform its functions. But this bill does not go to that length, and I assume that no one desires a law so broad and sweeping in its scope, because there is no necessity for it. The ordinary Government official is amply protected by local laws. He confronts no peculiar hazard on account of his official character, but a sad experience has taught us that the case is different with the President. I am opposed to the bill as reported by the Committee on the Judiciary because it injects into and makes part of the offense of the murder of the President elements of fact that can not but hamper and embarrass prosecutions, and it circumscribes and limits the scope of its operation in such a manner as to materially destroy its value as a protective measure.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, now may I inquire of the gentleman, does he think that the President of the United States is entitled to any greater protection by law than we give to the other officers of the Government whenever we undertake to punish offenses against them? Does the gentleman think a different rule should be applied to him from what is applied to any other officer if we undertake to protect him?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I do.

Mr. RAY of New York. Well, why?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. For this reason: After one hundred and odd years of experience we find that the President of the United States is peculiarly liable to assault and assassination. No other Federal officer is, and all laws are calculated to redress wrongs or prevent practical dangers.

Mr. RAY of New York. Why, how many Presidents since the organization of the Republic have been killed?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Three within half a century.

Mr. RAY of New York. Well, since the foundation of the Government, I asked the gentleman.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Three.

Mr. RAY of New York. Well, that is all, and an attempt was made to kill President Jackson earlier, I will suggest.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The gentleman will permit me to answer in my own way.

Mr. RAY of New York. That is all right.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Why, that is a matter of history.

Mr. RAY of New York. We have had scores of the other officers protected by law when in the discharge of duty assassinated at different times—all protected by law, all killed in violation of the law of the United States. We have confined our legislation always to the time while they were engaged in the performance of their duties.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes.

Mr. RAY of New York. What I want to get at is why is it that the legislative body, that the Congress of the United States, commencing away back in 1790, immediately after the adoption of the Constitution, when it commenced to make these laws, and when the Senators and Congressmen commenced to define the power of the United States, wrote into the laws for the protection of officers of the United States the words "while engaged in the performance of their duties?" And why have we continued it from that time down to the present? Now, you have got the import of my question. Is not this a significant fact, bearing on the existence or nonexistence of the power to protect officers—not conclusive, of course, but a fact showing the understanding of the framers of our Constitution?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I am glad to have that question. As I said a moment ago, we enact laws simply as experience teaches us that current conditions require them. During the first seventy years of the life of the Government about the only hazard a public officer encountered was that he might meet with resistance in the discharge of his official duty, and that hazard was confined mainly to United States marshals and revenue collectors while serving processes of courts, preserving peace, and collecting revenues; hence the laws in the main have applied to that class of officers in doing that which brought on the danger. But within the last half century the lives of three Presidents have been taken, not because of any official act, not because they were undertaking to enforce some obnoxious law, but simply because they stood for law and government, because they were the embodiment of sovereignty; and that crime has come to be so grave a menace to the safety and welfare of the people that Congress is now called upon to exercise a larger power, to exercise more ample authority, in the preservation and protection of its official machinery than experience had ever before demanded. That, and that alone, is the reason.

Now, the bill under consideration only protects the President of the United States while in the discharge of his official duty. And by that expression, by the use of that term, it recognizes the fact that there are times when the President is not in the discharge of his official duty. I believe I am safe in saying that in the judgment of a majority of the lawyers of the country no one of the Presidents who fell by the hand of an assassin was engaged in the discharge of his official duty at the time he was stricken down.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman excuse me? You recognize the fact that there are three elements of jurisdiction in the bill, do you not?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I do, but that is the principal one.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. When you say that the bill relies altogether upon the fact that the President was in the discharge of of his official duty you absolutely ignore the other fact, which is a very substantial and important one, that it protects him by reason of his official character, which is the argument you yourself have been making.

Mr. RAY of New York. By reason of his official character or anything that he has done or omitted to do.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. But the difficulty of the suggestion of the gentleman is that it makes that an issue of fact, to be proven before the court and jury trying the offender. It is a question of fact, and if the accused can show that the President was not engaged in the discharge of his official duty at the time of the assault, and that he had some other motive than that the President was a public officer, or that he had done or omitted some act that the assassin disapproved of, then he must go acquit. The gentleman from Maine will admit the truth of that proposition.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Now may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Has the gentleman reached a stage in his enthusiasm on this proposition where he wants to eliminate all facts and deprive the defendant of all rights when he is tried for a crime of this sort?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Oh, no.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Does he think the exigency requires that?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Oh, no; "the gentleman," in his enthusiasm, only desires the making of a practical and sensible law, a law that will protect the life of the President because he is President; that will protect him in the nighttime as well as in the daytime; that will protect him while he is walking upon the streets of the metropolitan city of New York, while in the pursuit of pleasure or on private business, as well as when he is in the White House attaching his official signature to some item of legislation. He is the President of the United States from the time he takes the oath until the expiration of his constitutional term; and the question of motive, and of what he is engaged in at the time of an assault upon him, has not, in my judgment, the remotest relation to the offense that is committed upon the people who constitute the Federal body politic.

The crime committed against the people of the United States in the assassination of a President is that it deprives them of the Chief Executive; deprives them of the officer who has been constitutionally selected to enforce the law, and to stand at the head of the Army and the Navy. He is the President always and at all times and at all places, and his assassination at one time and for one reason is as harmful and as destructive of Federal power as it is at any other time or for any other reason. I can not appreciate the hair-splitting distinctions of the constitutional gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] when he says that it is an offense against the sovereignty of the United States, against the people of this great Commonwealth, to assassinate the President while he is in the White House or while he is engaged in some official act, but that it is not a crime against the United States and that the Government suffers no derangement of its official machinery if the President while riding on horseback through Rock Creek Park should be shot and killed by a robber who desired to steal his saddle horse.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may be allowed to proceed.

Mr. RAY of New York. I yield to the gentleman fifteen minutes more.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Now, the authorities that have been cited in this debate under the statutes and under the peculiar circumstances of the crimes that were then the subject of investigation have absolutely no bearing upon the question under consideration.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. May I ask the gentleman whether he has examined these authorities with care? That is a simple question.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Well, it is not a simple question; there is considerable scope to the word "care."

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. It is not?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. No, indeed.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Have you read any one of the cases?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes; I have read one of them several times.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Which one?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The Neagle case.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Any others?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I have read the Davis case and the Cruikshank case in times past.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. In connection with this debate? I should like to know from the gentleman whether he has read these cases that he now proposes to comment upon and to discuss, as a matter of preparation for this debate and for the discussion of this constitutional question?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I have read only the Neagle case in my preparation for this debate; but I heard the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] and all the advocates of this bill, and the theory which they have advanced with reference to these cases is not new. It has been familiar to me and, I presume, to every lawyer in the country ever since the cases were decided. It is not a new question. The judicial history of the United States should be familiar to every lawyer. It is not necessary to read those cases to know whether Congress has the power to pass upon questions which they in no manner consider.

Mr. RAY of New York. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I will if my time will justify.

Mr. RAY of New York. Is there a single case in any law book printed in the United States, whether it be cited in a text-book or be a decided case reported in the decisions, where the court or the author, in defining the jurisdiction and power of the United States, through its Congress, in enacting law to protect any of its officers, does not say substantially in terms that the jurisdiction exists when the officer is engaged in the performance of his duty or because of his official character, etc.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I answer the gentleman in the negative; and he can not find a single decision, he can not point to a single text-book of reputable standing in this country, that holds the power of Congress is limited and circumscribed in any such way.

Mr. RAY of New York. You say you answer in the negative. Let me put my question again; perhaps I did not put it clearly before. Can you say that there is a book, a decided case, or text-book on law where it is not stated in substance that in order to give the Congress jurisdiction to define and punish an offense against an officer undertaking to protect the officer of the Government that the offense must be committed against him while in the performance of his duties, or because of his official character, or because of some official act or omission?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I undertake to say that wherever the courts or wherever the text writers have undertaken to discuss the power of Congress, and not simply to interpret some local circumscribed act which Congress has already passed, but where the courts and the law writers have undertaken to construe the power of Congress, they have uniformly said that Congress had ample authority, inherent and express, to pass all laws that are necessary to preserve the life of the country and to protect the official machinery of the Government. [Applause.]

Mr. RAY of New York. Why, then——

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Within the scope——

Mr. CRUMPACKER. With no limitation.

Mr. RAY of New York. Let me finish my question. And you say that they do not include all that I have mentioned?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes, sir; I say that.

Mr. RAY of New York. Will you name one text-book?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I challenge the gentleman to produce any case.

Mr. RAY of New York. I challenge the gentleman to produce a text-book or decision of any court where these words are left out in defining the jurisdiction of the United States. Name it, if you can.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to speak in my own way.

Mr. RAY of New York. Can you name one? Will you name such a case?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. If the gentleman will just possess himself in silence for a moment, I will answer.

Mr. RAY of New York. No; I will not, unless you make me.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Then I appeal to the Chair.

Mr. RAY of New York. If you refuse to yield, I will.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Now, what does the gentleman want me to answer?

Mr. RAY of New York. Now, I ask you fairly, can you name any such case?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Not from memory.

Mr. RAY of New York. I ask you again, can you now name any such text-book?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes.

Mr. RAY of New York. Name it.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Cooley's Constitutional Limitations.

Mr. RAY of New York. Cooley's Constitutional Limitations.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Story on the Constitution.

Mr. RAY of New York. Story on the Constitution.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Kent's Commentaries; Tucker on the Constitution.

Mr. RAY of New York. Very good. More of them?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Well, I think those are sufficient.

Mr. RAY of New York. Have you in your argument——

Mr. CRUMPACKER. If the gentleman will do me fairness not to fritter away my time——

Mr. RAY of New York. Who is giving you the time?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Why, I might name others that bear out the truth of my argument, but I confess, Mr. Chairman, that I do not have in my mind any particular decision. I am stating a general proposition that I think is familiar to every lawyer in the country, or it ought to be at least, and because I can not name a particular decision——

Mr. RAY of New York. Just a moment.

Mr. CRUMPACKER (continuing). It does not militate against the force of the proposition that I am announcing. The gentleman from New York will not deny the fact that the courts have said repeatedly that the Federal Government has the inherent power to pass all laws necessary to protect its institutions, to carry on its functions, and for its own preservation—the gentleman will not deny that, and that is all I am asserting. Upon that basis I say we have a right to pass a law making it a capital offense to assassinate the President of the United States at any time during the period of his constitutional term. [Applause.]

Mr. RAY of New York. May I ask the gentleman a question, and I will yield to him further?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Go ahead.

Mr. RAY of New York. I have read all of these works very carefully, and the limitations suggested in every one of them, as well as expressly stated in all the decided cases. While I am a lawyer and have searched diligently, I have not found any such statement as the gentleman makes without the qualification that I have given, and I wanted to be pointed to some work or book where I could find it; that is all.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Since the gentleman from New York has made that statement, I want to say that I have read his report carefully and all the extracts of decisions and his comments upon them, and every authority he referred to, except one, the Neagle case, it relates to the construction of some particular statute. They relate to the interpretation and construction of statutes, and not to the general power of Congress at all. They relate to acts of Congress that are circumscribed and limited, for the purpose of accomplishing some particular purpose, and not one of them undertakes to discuss the broad power of Congress to protect the lives of its functionaries. If there be any such general authority as that, the gentleman has failed to put it into the elaborate and exhaustive report he made in support of the bill, which he has so ably championed.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I do not want to interrupt the gentleman, but will the gentleman from Indiana be kind enough to give me the pages and the books he referred to, between now and to-morrow morning, so that I can have the benefit of them.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It may be that I can do so. I believe there ought to be a section in this bill providing that it shall be a capital offense to unlawfully take the life of the President or Vice-President elect of the United States. Now, that proposition will strike a gentleman of the mental constitution of the distinguished chairman of the committee as an absurdity on its face. Look at it! This is a popular government. It is founded upon popular elections, and the Constitution and laws of the country go elaborately into the methods of choosing the Chief Magistrate of the United States. When the people throughout the length and breadth of the land meet and solemnly select one of their fellow-citizens to be the Chief Magistrate for the term of four years from the 4th of the next March, they invest that individual with a peculiar national character. He becomes from that time the particular representative of all the people of the country.

But if an assassin should take his life after he is constitutionally elected and before he is inducted into office, in spite of the power of Congress—that is, if Congress has no power to punish the crime—it must be confessed that this Government is a weak affair indeed. Based upon popular elections, it has no power to preserve to the people the fruits of those elections, and the popular will can be overthrown with impunity. I can not consent to a doctrine so destructive and so humiliating. Think of it! The Federal Government, that makes popular elections the foundation of its political life, without power to throw its strong arm of protection around the one the people have chosen to be their Chief Magistrate. The proposition is preposterous. I say that Congress has as much power to protect the President-elect as it has to protect the President after inauguration. When the President is assassinated, the people are deprived of a Chief Magistrate, of the one whom they chose to stand at the head of the Government and to represent its sovereignty, the one to whom they committed the high responsibility of administering the laws of the country.

The operations of the Government are embarrassed, the official machinery is destroyed or seriously impaired, and the highest right of the people is overthrown. The people have the right to select their own Chief Magistrate in the constitutional method, and nothing can be more destructive of popular institutions than the overthrow of that right. If it is accomplished by the dastardly act of an assassin, the wrong to the people is just the same, whether the motive of the criminal is politics, robbery, or private revenge, or whether the President was engaged in his official duties at the time or in recreation or private business. The assassination brings one to preside over affairs of the country who is not the choice of the people, whose authority does not come from the consent of the governed, expressed in the constitutional manner.

Mr. Chairman, I propose, when the time comes, to move to amend section 1 of the bill by striking out the qualifying provisions so that it will read: "That whoever unlawfully and purposely kills the President of the United States shall suffer death." [Applause.] That is all we need in that section.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I hope the gentleman's time will be extended, for I want to ask him whether the word "unlawfully" is, in his opinion, essential.

Mr. RAY of New York. I yield the gentleman further time.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I wish to ask the gentleman whether he thinks that the term "unlawfully"—I am asking the question in perfect good faith, because we are all anxious, I presume, to reach a rightful result—whether the gentleman thinks the term "unlawfully" is essential, or, at least, that the Senate bill is incomplete without it?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The Senate bill has the equivalent terms "willfully and maliciously." They are more than the equivalent of "unlawfully." They are broader in their scope.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Does the gentleman think that the terms in the Senate bill are sufficient?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That language is more than equivalent. An act which is "willful and malicious" must of necessity be unlawful.

Now, this is my idea about the use of the term "unlawfully." The right of self-defense is the first of all rights—it is paramount. When a member of society is killed by another a wrong is done to society, and if the victim be a public officer an injury may be inflicted upon the government in addition. But if the homicide is justifiable—that is, if it is committed in self-defense—the right of the perpetrator to protect his own life is paramount to the right of society, and the homicide is not unlawful. In order to make the killing of a person punishable, it must be unjustifiable and unlawful.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Then the gentleman's idea is that the words "willfully and maliciously" would adequately cover the proposition?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I think so.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I intended in the time allotted to me to discuss the bill more fully, but I have been diverted and my time has been consumed largely by interruptions; but, in brief, my view is—and I am willing to plant myself squarely upon it, and I do not think it is a case of hysterics either—that since we are legislating upon this subject, making it a Federal question, we ought to make a law broad enough and simple enough to protect the people of the United States against assaults upon the President and those in the line of succession at all times and under all conditions. If an offender charged with crime under the provisions of this bill should secure an acquittal on account of some of the special provisions injected into it and made part of the offense, the moral effect of that acquittal upon a trial in a State court for the same act would be exceedingly difficult to overcome. It furnishes loopholes for the escape of criminals. It is always unwise policy to divide criminal jurisdiction in the manner proposed by this bill.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. One question, if the gentleman pleases, bearing upon his suggestion—in which, I have no doubt, he feels full confidence—that the bill ought to protect the candidate for the Presidency after he is elected——

Mr. CRUMPACKER. No; that is not it.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. What is your proposition?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. My proposition is that after a citizen has been elected to the office of President—after the electors have solemnly asssembled and chosen him as the Chief Magistrate—he ought to be protected because——

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Has he then any official connection with the Government?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. He has a constitutional connection with the Government; he is a part of the Government's official armory.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Is he at the time?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. He is from the time he is elected, and that is the only way to preserve to the people of the country the fruits of the election.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Does his election make him an officer before he has undertaken the duties of the office?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It is not necessary that he be an officer. We have the right to protect popular elections and to preserve popular government by safeguarding the life of the President-elect.

Mr. LANHAM. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCDERMOTT].

[Mr. MCDERMOTT addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message in writing from the President of the United States, by Mr. B. F. BARNES, one of his secretaries, was received.

PROTECTION OF THE PRESIDENT.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. RAY of New York. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] five minutes.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Chairman, while I am in favor of the general features of this bill and will support it, yet I do not think it goes far enough, and I trust we may be able to amend it so as to protect the President and Vice-President at all times, whether engaged in the performance of their official duties or not.

I can also support the clauses relative to anarchists, although if it were practicable to carry out Senator HOAR'S plan of getting the powers of the world to set apart an island or other suitable territory to which could be deported all anarchists, there to be allowed to work out their peculiar ideas of government at their own sweet will, even if in doing so they wipe out themselves as well as their government.

But one of my constituents suggests that all anarchists be banished to hell, for the following reasons:

First. It was decreed by the Almighty as a place of punishment for the wicked.

Second. It is neutral and beyond the scope of international controversy or dispute.

Third. It is within easy reach of all civilized nations.

Fourth. There need be no fear of their escape.

And, lastly, all nations can select their own route of transportation—by scaffold, electric chair, guillotine, etc.

After a trial of this plan I doubt not that it would settle the anarchist problem for all time. [Loud applause.]

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield to my colleague from Texas [Mr. BALL].

Mr. BALL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose to discuss this bill at length. The only reason for the presentation of a bill of this character, and the only excuse for its presence here, is a determination upon the part of Congress to protect the President of the United States, and those entitled to succession in that office in case of his death, from unlawful violence, and to bring more speedily to justice and more surely to retribution any man who shall kill or attempt to kill the President of the United States. If this bill does not accomplish that purpose, then it ought not to be here.

We have had two trials of the assassins of Presidents, the one in the case of Guiteau under Federal authority and the other in the case of Czolgosz under the authority of the State of New York. In the Guiteau case for weeks a trial was carried on here, sensational in its nature, and the papers were filled with interviews and statements that were damaging in their nature to public morals. In the trial recently held in New York the assassin of President McKinley was put away according to the most approved modern methods, with the least amount of fuss and feathers ever known in a great criminal trial in this country. So that so far as expedition is concerned there is nothing in the giving of jurisdiction of crimes of this nature to the Federal courts. Unless it is certain that punishment will be speedier and retribution more sure, and assassins thereby intimidated from such dastardly acts, the necessity of any change is questionable.

Now, I undertake to say, without going into a discussion of this bill, that it is probably less effective, that by its terms it places a burden upon the prosecution of assassins of the Chief Executive of this nation, if we should ever be so unfortunate as to have one, that does not now exist in the courts which have jurisdiction to try such cases. For instance, it was not necessary in New York when Czolgosz was tried to prove whether or not President McKinley was there engaged in official duty, or that he was killed because of his official character. The prosecution simply proved that the man killed him in a dastardly, sneaking, anarchistic manner while the President was attempting to grasp the hand of the demon, stretched forth in pretended friendship, and the world was ridden of his murderer in a very short space of time.

Now, then, according to this bill, if Czolgosz had been tried thereunder it would have devolved upon the prosecution to prove additional facts, both to confer jurisdiction and secure a conviction. It brings an atmosphere, an element of uncertainty, into the vindication of the law that does not now exist. And I undertake to say, with all due deference to the gentleman from New York, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, for whom I have the highest respect as a lawyer, and the other gentlemen who are members of that committee, that in my judgment, so far as the laws of my own State are concerned, if a man was acquitted upon the technicality in a Federal court as to whether or not the President was or was not engaged when killed in the discharge of official duty, or whether or not he was killed because of his official character, and prosecution of such person was attempted in the State courts of Texas, where the crime was committed, then under the constitution of Texas, its laws, and the decisions of our courts, I believe that while a demurrer to the indictment would not be sustained, a plea of "autrefois acquit" would be good as an abatement of the prosecution.

The offense defined by the bill is that of killing the President of the United States, and the words of limitation are merely jurisdictional. If indicted in the State courts, after an acquittal in the Federal courts by reason of the limitations placed upon the offense, the charge in the State court would be the unlawful killing. And I believe that the provision in the Constitution of the United States, the constitution of Texas, and the laws of Texas would be interpreted by our State courts so as to hold that the offense was identical whether it was so "eonomine" or not.

The test applied in our courts being whether or not a conviction would rest upon the same facts to be proven, and not whether the indictments charged the same offense by name, they would, I believe, declare that the accused had been once before in jeopardy of life and limb and could not again be placed in such jeopardy. It seems idle to me to contend that the provision in the Federal Constitution that no citizen of the United States shall be twice placed in jeopardy for the same offense and a like provision in the constitution of the States could by any fair intendment be given force and effect by the doctrine that a man could be tried and acquitted for killing the President or anybody else in the Federal court and then tried in the State for the same killing.

I do not appreciate the distinction attempted to be drawn in the contention that there is a difference between killing a man because he is President and killing him because of any other reason. At best, the real offense is the killing, and the limitations placed in this bill are merely jurisdictional. I can not accept the doctrine of dual sovereignty as sound law, in so far as it implies the right to dual prosecution for the same offense. I believe that the provision in the Constitution of the United States, that no person shall be twice put in jeopardy of life and limb for the same offense, absolutely takes away from the States jurisdiction to try a man for an offense of which he has been acquitted in the Federal court.

I have not given the exhaustive study to this measure that has been given to it by the gentleman who prepared the bill. I simply briefly outline my views as to the general propositions involved. Concede, for the sake of argument, that my contentions are not sound, and that the slayer of a President acquitted upon the ground that the killing was not on account of the official character or official acts of the President, and therefore the State courts could proceed to try him where the offense was committed. What, then, have you gained by the passage of this bill except to interpose the Federal courts to delay and not facilitate the vengeance of the law upon the assassin?

Are you in any better position to trust such cases to the Federal courts, where the question of jurisdiction could be raised and a technical acquittal be had both in Federal and State courts, than you would be to trust the courts which have heretofore been effective in such cases? It is not possible to visit punishment more swiftly than in the case tried under the laws of New York upon the assassin of our late lamented President. Understand, I am not insistent upon retaining exclusive jurisdiction of such cases in State courts.

I have no objection to giving the Federal courts power to provide and enforce uniform penalties for assaults upon our Chief Executive. The difficulty to me is, if the chairman of the Judiciary Committee and others are right in their contention that Federal courts can have only a limited jurisdiction in the matter and can not be given jurisdiction to try the President's assailant, regardless of the time, place, or manner of the assault, what possible good can come from the adoption of a policy and the enactment of a law more likely to delay than to advance swift and sure retribution upon the person who takes from 80,000,000 of people their duly elected Chief Executive?

Mr. LANHAM. I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MADDOX].

[Mr. MADDOX addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Chairman, it is with the greatest diffidence that I make any suggestion at all about a bill that has been as carefully considered by the Judiciary Committee as has this one. The only suggestion that I make about it at all is one that Judge Little, of Arkansas, made to me, that if you would say "any person that kills the President of the United States because he is President shall be hanged" you would exhaust the whole subject. That would remove most of the objections which have been raised as to the language of the bill.

Booth killed Lincoln because Lincoln was President, and he could have had no other reason under heaven. Guiteau killed Garfield because Garfield was President and for no other reason. Czolgosz killed McKinley because McKinley was President, and he could not have killed him for any other reason, for he had never seen him and had no acquaintance whatever with him. But I did not get up to make any suggestion to the Judiciary Committee. I want to address myself——

Mr. RAY of New York. I would like to suggest to the gentleman that I am glad to hear from one member of the House who did not have a bill before our committee; although I can not say that every one did, we certainly had a pile large enough to have embraced every member of the House.

Mr. CLARK. If I had time, Mr. Chairman, I could deliver a very interesting discourse on the thoughts that went through my own mind from the time President McKinley was shot until Congress assembled, about what ought to be done in the premises. There never was a more amiable man on the face of the earth than was Mr. McKinley, and it was largely by reason of the amiability of the man that the "deep damnation of his taking off" caused such a shock to the American people.

There was another reason for it. Every citizen of this Republic, worthy of the name, felt when Mr. McKinley was shot at Buffalo that he himself was assaulted, that the life of the Government was assaulted. I tried to study up a remedy. Everybody was suggesting this and that. If it were not for the narrow constitutional definition of treason, it would have been as easy as falling off a log—simply to have declared that to kill or assault a President unlawfully was treason; but the constitutional definition of treason precludes that remedy. After all the thought of all of us—of all the people in fact——

I undertake to say there is not a man in this House or out of it that has come to a conclusion perfectly satisfactory, even to himself, as to how to deal with this subject yet. Of course I believe that anarchists ought to be hanged, the whole gang of them, but the trouble about hanging anarchists and keeping them out of this country is to find out who is the anarchist. If he has sense enough to keep his mouth shut, you will never find it out.

Finally, after a good deal of cogitation, I gave it up and left it to the Judiciary Committee, where it properly belongs.

Whether the House committee's substitute is perfect, the House committee deserves the praise given it by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], having made a vast improvement on the Senate bill.

But I do not want to talk about that. I rose to have it "out" with my friend from New Jersey [Mr. MCDERMOTT] about the definition of murder and whether you can try a man both under the State law as it is and under this Federal law, if you pass it.

The gentleman dealt with only one-half of this question. I believe you can try a man under this statute, if you pass it, and then if you do not convict him you can try him under the State law and convict him. There is no reason why you can not prosecute a man for counterfeiting both under the laws of the United States and the State laws. You might inflict a very mild punishment on him the second time for counterfeiting, and I suppose you would. But if you convicted him of killing a President, etc., under either of these laws—the Federal or the State law—you never could punish him further, because he would be hanged if convicted under either; although in the State of Missouri there was a case where a man was in the penitentiary serving a life sentence for one murder and then was sentenced to be hanged for committing another murder while in the penitentiary, and, as a matter of fact, he was hanged for the latter murder.

As to the question of murder in general, every State in the Union, except Louisiana, operates under the common law or under some modification of the common law. And for fear I may forget to say it further on, I will say now that if a man in the State of Louisiana should commit this crime he would be in a worse fix than in a State where the common law or some modification of it prevails, because in Louisiana, where they have the Napoleonic code, an assault with intent to kill is a capital offense, and frequently the man assaulted attends the hanging himself; but that is not the law in any other State of the Union, so far as I know, although it used to be in Kentucky.

My friend from New Jersey says that if you try a man under this statute and there is a failure to convict, you can not try him under a State statute. Let us see whether that is true. What does this statute which you gentlemen are fixing here say? That "any person who unlawfully, purposely, and knowingly kills the President of the United States," etc., shall be hanged. Suppose we try a man under this and he is acquitted, what have you tried him for? In every State in the Union the language of the first section of your bill defines manslaughter and not murder in either the first or second degree, and manslaughter is not a capital offense in any State. The essence of the common-law definition of murder is "the killing of a human being with malice prepense" or with "malice aforethought," to use plain English.

The common law did not divide murder into the first degree and the second degree. It differentiated homicide into murder and manslaughter. The statutes of Missouri—perhaps those of other States as well—define murder in the first and second degrees and several sorts of manslaughter. The definition of murder in the first degree is "the killing of a human being willfully, deliberately, premeditatedly, on purpose and of malice aforethought," and the penalty is death. "Deliberately" has been defined by the courts to mean "in a cool state of the blood." Leave "deliberately" out, and you have murder in the second degree—penalty from ten years to a life term in the penitentiary.

Whether right or wrong on my proposition that a man may be prosecuted for a capital offense under both the Federal and State statutes, no matter under which the first prosecution is had ending in acquittal, I feel absolutely certain that if he is first prosecuted under the proposed Federal statute and acquitted, he may then be prosecuted under the State statute. But it is really a bootless inquiry, for if the facts on the trial harmonized, proved the allegations of the indictment, he would be convicted in whichever court got hold of him first, and would be duly and expeditiously executed; so that in practice the question would never arise. A man who unlawfully kills a President—unless his insanity be clearly established—would have absolutely no chance whatever of escaping with his life, no matter who the President might be or who the murderer might be.

My friend from New Jersey quotes that portion of the fifth amendment to the Constitution which declares that no person shall for the same offense be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb.

Mr. RAY of New York. Before the gentleman enters upon that branch of the question, may I call his attention to a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States on the subject he has just been discussing?

Mr. CLARK. Certainly.

Mr. RAY of New York. The Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of the United States v. Cruikshank (92 U. S. Reports, 542-554), has pointed out the distinction between the jurisdiction of the United States and the jurisdiction of the States, where an act constitutes two offenses; so that a man may be punished twice for the same act, although not twice for the same offense. I will read, with the gentleman's permission, the language of the Chief Justice:

True, it may sometimes happen that a person is amenable to both jurisdictions for one and the same act. Thus, if a marshal of the United States is unlawfully resisted while executing the process of the courts within a State, and the resistance is accompanied by an assault on the officer, the sovereignty of the United States is violated by the resistance and that of the State by the breach of the peace in the assault.

Mr. CLARK. I am obliged to the gentleman from New York for that citation.

Mr. RAY of New York. And then he gives other like illustrations.

Mr. CLARK. Now, Mr. Chairman, as I started to say, my friend from New Jersey [Mr. MCDERMOTT] reads a part of the fifth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which says that no person shall be twice put in jeopardy for the same offense. The answer to that is that the first ten amendments to the Constitution were passed to restrict the powers of Congress and not to restrict the powers of the States. That has been decided over and over and over again, so that after the Federal authorities got through with a homicide under the first sections of this bill, if they failed to convict him, it is none of the business of the Federal Government what the State of Missouri or the State of Arkansas or the State of Texas does to him. The Federal Government could hang him for killing a President. Missouri or any other State would hang him for murdering a man. So he would be hanged anyway, which is the great desideratum.

Mr. COOMBS. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt at this point?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK. Yes; with pleasure.

Mr. COOMBS. Suppose that the President is assassinated in Alaska, the District of Columbia, or in any of the Territories of the United States. Suppose the person who commits the offense is first tried under this law and is acquitted and discharged. Is not that once in jeopardy, and then would you not have to invoke a United States law and try him again?

Mr. CLARK. In that case it is the same jurisdiction, and the same sovereignty, and the offense is committed against the same government. I wish to repeat the statement that anything I say about this bill I say with a great deal of diffidence. I am in favor of extending this provision not only to the President and Vice-President, but to the members of the Cabinet, who are in the line of succession, and I will tell you why. Two of the most dangerous crises this country ever passed through were when it happened twice that there was only one life between the people of the United States and no government at all. The first was when Vice-President Hendricks died, and the Senate had failed to elect a President pro tempore of the Senate, and there was no Speaker; and the second was when General Garfield was killed and one life only, and that was General Arthur, stood between the people of the United States and no government at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield five more minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. CLARK. For that very reason, if President Arthur or President Cleveland had been killed, by some kind of automatic action, this Government would have gone on until they could have elected somebody, and it is the only country under heaven where such a thing could happen. On account of those two accidental situations the line of succession was changed, so as to increase the number of persons who may succeed to the Presidency. The number is comparitively small yet, and a thoroughly organized conspiracy in this city might in one hour kill the entire set of men who are in line of Presidential succession, and for that reason—not because they are any better than anybody else intrinsically—I am in favor of making it extend to the whole lot.

It is absolutely true that the President of the United States intrinsically and theoretically is no better than any other good citizen of the Republic. It is not so much the individual we are trying to protect as to protect the Government of the United States and the people of the United States not only against anarchy, but against sorrow and agony of spirit, such as pervaded the entire country when President McKinley was killed. According to my judgment, the most valuable part of this bill is the part of it which authorizes the punishment of the villains who go around over the country making public speeches advising the assassination of people because they hold public office.

I do not know how it is in other States, but I believe as firmly as that I am living that we have a statute in Missouri against the disturbance of the peace, a drag-net statute, under which I can send any anarchist in the United States to jail. It runs in this way—that it is a misdemeanor "to use profane, obscene, offensive, or tumultuous language, calculated to provoke a breach of the peace," and surely for some fellow to stand up in an audience in this country and preach the doctrine that the President or any other official ought to be killed, simply and solely because he is an official, is calculated to disturb the peace of every man that hears him make such a speech and of every man that hears of his making such a speech. I am probably as jealous of the right of free speech as anybody, but I have no fear whatever that that section of this bill, if it is ever passed, will be extended or construed into the curtailment of free speech in this country as free speech ought to be engaged in.

The bill may not be ideal in its character. My friend from Missouri, Judge DE ARMOND, suggests that probably it might be bettter to take out the thirteenth section, but I will guarantee this to be the fact, that that thirteenth section is never going to make the assassin of the President of the United States get hanged or electrocuted one-half second sooner than he will be hanged or electrocuted without the thirteenth section, because you can not go into a single neighborhood in the United States and impanel a jury of the citizens of this country who will not hang the man that kills the President of the United States—that is, unless the President is assaulting him, which is a very violent presumption, in which case it is not an unlawful killing.

You can not go into any neighborhood in the remotest part or corner of the United States and summon a jury from the body of the people that will not make that very presumption in their own minds that is in the thirteenth section against the prisoner when it is proved that he has killed a President. It is not because the people deem a President superior individually to other citizens, but it is because of the disturbance of society, the anguish of the people, and the destruction of business; it is the fact that the murder of a President brings governmental and republican institutions into disrepute that the American people have made up their minds that no quarter shall be shown to these anarchists and assassins.

Referring to what the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BALL] said, contrasting the trial of Guiteau in this city with the trial of Czolgosz at Buffalo, I want to say that the trial of Czolgosz at Buffalo was an honor to the jurisprudence of this country; and I have always said, and repeat it here now, that the trial of Guiteau in the city of Washington was a lasting disgrace to the jurisprudence of this country. If he had been tried before a good country lawyer it would not have taken five days to convict him. Criminal laws are intended not so much to mete out vengeance as to prevent crime. If this bill has any tendency to serve notice on the lawless classes of this country that they are going to be "worked off," as Dickens called it, with any more facility than they can be "worked off" under the existing laws, I am in favor of it and will welcome it as a blessing. [Applause.]

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I wish to submit a few thoughts in addition to what I have already expressed in the speech made in the beginning of this discussion concerning the impolicy and unwisdom of certain portions of this bill. I will insert in connection with what I now say the views presented by myself when the House bill was originally reported, and which are as follows:

There are some features of this bill which I approve. I am in favor of all suitable legislation to discourage and prevent the coming into our country of all such persons as oppose organized government and seek its subversion. Our citizenship should not be impaired and our institutions should not be imperiled by the immigration and naturalization of anarchists. There is no place for them in our free country. Their presence among us is not only undesirable, but dangerous. We have never intended to open an asylum to those who are not in sympathy with our laws and forms of government, much less to those who oppose and teach antagonism to every kind of civil government. They ought to be restrained from taking abode with us and prevented from the propagation in our midst of their pernicious doctrines. I am cheerful to support so much of the bill now reported as seeks to accomplish this object.

I can not, however, give my assent to the propriety of the passage of any law which proposes to single out any citizen of our country and make it a special or peculiar offense to take his life as contradistinguished from that of any other citizen. We have ample laws, State and Federal, for the conviction and punishment of homicide against whomsoever committed within the respective jurisdictions. I deny the proposition that one honest and law-abiding man's life is any more sacred than that of another. Any officer of our Government is but the servant of the people, and "the servant can not be greater than his lord." The holding or possession of office does not of itself render any man impeccable or immune from human frailties and imperfections. Public men among us can do wrong. There is no such thing as royalty or titled nobility or hereditary prerogative in the United States of America. With us there are no artificial distinctions, and one good man is as good as another, and as much sanctity surrounds the life of one as it does that of another.

The murder of the humblest citizen in our land is just as heinous, just as felonious, as that of the greatest or most distinguished. Murder is murder, upon whomsoever inflicted, and a human life is a human life by whomsoever enjoyed. The life of the highest officer in the country, or that of any ambassador of a foreign government, is no more precious in the sight of God and republican man than is that of the humblest and most insignificant resident of our great Republic.

While Presidents have been murdered—and we all agree and denounce "the deep damnation of their taking off"—still we must remember, to the credit of our laws, State and Federal, that in no case have their slayers escaped condign punishment. Guiteau was executed upon conviction in a Federal court, and Czolgosz suffered the highest punishment under State jurisdiction and with all dispatch consistent with the orderly administration of justice. Booth was shot to death without trial in the courts. There is no probability that any such murderer would go unwhipped of justice wherever the offense might be committed.

It may well be doubted if such a law as is here contemplated would add to the protection of the life of the President or other officials named, or in any respect diminish the danger to which they might be exposed. Whoever shall murder either of them is bound to know that under existing laws he will speedily receive the punishment he deserves, whether it be enforced by the hangman's rope or electric volts. The moral pervert, or fanatic, or anarchist, does not stop to consider the severity or certainty of punishment. It would seem that he is ambitious to pose as a heroic martyr and to die the death of a stoic. Though the gibbet or the guillotine, the gallows or the electrocution chair may stare him in the face, they are, in his disordered brain, but the instruments that will add to his conception of prowess and self-sacrifice; his perverted pride is to defy all law and disregard consequences. I am not sure that a law like that here proposed would not tend to increase rather than lessen the danger to those whom it is designed to protect. To violate such a law might all the more magnify the importance of the deed in the distempered fancy of those who are inclined to destroy kings and rulers, and stimulate rather than repress such reckless and criminal disposition.

It may be possible by the ingenious use of language, framed to meet a suppositious case, to construct a bill which would be constitutional upon its face, and thus confer jurisdiction upon the Federal courts to enter within the territorial boundaries of a State and try offenders for crimes cognizable in the State courts. But is it either wise or necessary to assert such a power as is proposed to be employed in this bill, and may it not lead to further encroachments of Federal jurisdiction?

Our laws now define the circumstances under which the Federal courts may try anyone charged with murder or other crimes, and fix the venue.

A homicide committed within a State and not upon Federal territory is "against the peace and dignity of the State" where the offense is perpetrated, and such a State is not only interested, but obligated to vindicate the power and majesty of its own law.

There are certain powers of government which have never been delegated, never surrendered, but always abide in the States and the people. The preservation of these powers has been traditionally insisted upon, and any invasion thereof has always been regarded as a dangerous encroachment. Mr. Jefferson has left us his earnest admonitions in this respect. He said:

"I am sensible of the inroads daily making by the Federal into the jurisdiction of its coordinate associates, the State governments. * * * The judiciary branch is that instrument, which, working like gravity, without intermission, is to press us at last into one consolidated mass. * * * If Congress fails to shield the States from dangers so palpable and so imminent, the States must shield themselves and meet the invader foot to foot."

It is true that not only our own country, but all the world, stood aghast at the horrible assassination of President McKinley. It aroused the deepest indignation, not only of our own people, but of every friend of law and humanity. While we mourn his loss, we must remember that the vengeance of man and the powers of the law—the State law of New York—have been fully exhausted upon his slayer, who now fills a felon's grave, and we should not permit our sorrow at the untimely death of the late lamented President to obscure our judgment or carry us beyond the well-defined limitations of Federal power; nor our exasperation at the deed, which can never be recalled, to lead us to invade the jurisdiction belonging, respectively, to the great States of the Union.

I wish to remark further that our country is laid upon a different foundation from that on which are built monarchies and empires. We have no such things as thrones or crowned heads. We have no kings or rulers in the sense which other governments regard their sovereigns. With us all sovereignty rests and remains with the people. "Subject" is an odious word when applied to a citizen of the United States of America. We are not even expected to speak with bated breath or servile reverence when we take upon our lips the name of anyone whom we may have chosen to make, execute, or interpret our laws. We have never been taught to bend the knee except to our Heavenly Master. We are not obligated to wear particular apparel or small swords in attendance upon our select servants, much less to kiss their hands or walk backwards in their presence, nor stand with subdued mien or an abashed modus at their appearance, nor hide away from the approach of royal retinue.

We have been accustomed to our plain and simple and equal ways so long that it will be hard to teach us, especially those of us who are confirmed in our thoughts and habits, to reconstruct ourselves and assimilate to any condition of things which savors of royalty. What may happen to our children and their children, God only knows, if matters proceed as their trend now seems to be.

In the old days it was George the Third, Rex, in Great Britain; with us it was plain George Washington, "first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen." The one sought to rule over our colonial fathers, to collect taxes without representation in the imposition thereof, and to do many other grievous things; the other contended that "these Colonies ought to be free and independent states," and their people ought to have their liberty. Here began the historic differentiation on our shores between kingdoms and republics, and some of our ancestors and some of us have been striving to emphasize and preserve the well-defined cleavage. It will be a sad day in this Republic when the distinction shall be lost in obscuration.

I may say without immodesty that I have had considerable experience in the practice of law before the criminal courts of the country, and have bestowed some degree of thought and reflection upon criminology in most of its aspects. It is right that we should have statutes against crime, from the simplest misdemeanor to the gravest felony, and it is right that proper punishment should follow their violation, and it will in all civilized and well-regulated communities. Every criminal lawyer knows that there are certain occasional forms of homicidal mania, traceable to moral perversion, depravity, or other pernicious influences brought about in some way, not always easily defined, but nevertheless found to exist, in which neither the celerity, certainty, nor severity of punishment can be said to have any deterrent effect upon the offender. Who has not read of cases where, in the frenzy of religious enthusiasm, even parents have taken the lives of their children in response to what they wildly imagined was a divine command?

In such a case the terror of a violated law and the dread of human punishment neither protect the persons of their unfortunate victims nor restrain the commission of the deed. If Guiteau and Czolgosz were sane—and it is unprofitable now to discuss that matter—can anyone doubt that each of them knew that he would surely suffer death for the horrible deeds of which they were respectively guilty? They absolutely courted capital punishment. They committed their awful crimes in the most public way possible, where there was neither chance of concealment or escape. The death penalty stared each of them in the face and was subsequently inflicted. Was it in any sense a protection to either of our martyred Presidents or did it have the slightest effect in preventing the crimes?

The presence of the Army of the United States would not have caused either assassin to stay his hand. Unless the purpose had been detected and means to thwart it promptly taken all the powers of the law were in vain.

If swift, certain, or severe penalties could have stayed the hand of the assassin, our murdered Presidents would have been alive to-day so far as liability to lose their lives in such a way is concerned. The life of no future President will be protected nor his murder prevented by the passage of so much of this bill as makes it a special and peculiar offense to do violence to him. It is never safe nor wise nor expedient in any important concern to do anything that is unnecessary or useless. Some definite object, some salutary and beneficial purpose, should inspire all human conduct, even in the ordinary relations of life, and still more so in all deliberative and legislative bodies.

We can not say that "if it does no good it will do no harm" to specialize or peculiarize homicide as is here proposed. It will be, as formerly stated, a new departure and a movement out of sympathy with our usual methods and traditions. It will savor of a statute against regicide, when we have no kings. It will give color to the idea that we make artificial distinctions and preferences among our own people, all of whom are created equal. It will give impetus to imperial tendencies, unfortunately already visible and causing the serious apprehension of thoughtful people.

It is, as I have heretofore said, an un-American, unrepublican, undemocratic proposition and can not stand the test of cool and dispassionate analysis. Yielding to it may express heart tenderness, but it can not reflect mental deliberation and sound judgment nor a careful consideration of consequences. It will not be regarded as the calm and sober work of the philosophical and practical lawgiver of a popular government. It is after the similitude of royalty and titled nobility and contrary to the genius of our institutions. If it should pass Congress it ought to be vetoed by the President not only on his own account but for the safety of those who shall follow him, as well as for the stronger reason that it is monarchical rather than republican.

We can not afford to undermine the structure our fathers reared—we can not afford to remove a single foundation stone which was laid by them. We must stand as a republic, with all that a republic means, or there will be a monarchy erected upon its ruins. We can not be too vigilant and resistful at any approach of doctrine or practice at variance with all our training and traditions. This cloud may appear small to some—not larger than a man's hand—by others it may be regarded as "big with mercy;" but it is destined to gather fury, spread over our sky, and break with disaster upon our heads. [Applause.]

I have now yielded to all gentlemen who have requested time from me, with the exception of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PATTERSON], who is not prepared to speak this afternoon, but who will likely wish to use ten or fifteen minutes to-morrow. If there is any other gentleman present who would like to be heard for a few minutes, I will yield to him.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I may desire to make some remarks on the measure in the morning. I do not know that I will, but I may.

Mr. LANHAM. It has just been suggested to me by my friend and colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH], that possibly he may wish to submit some remarks to-morrow.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Are there any other speakers to-morrow?

Mr. LANHAM. Perhaps I may wish a few minutes for the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT].

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, may I ask if there is any gentleman on the Republican side who desires to speak at all on this matter now? The gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] will close the debate on our side to-morrow, and I understand the gentleman from Texas has two more speakers.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Three.

Mr. RAY of New York. I would suggest that we make an arrangement for the closing of debate. I will ask the gentleman from Texas how long his speakers will take?

Mr. LANHAM. I think certainly not over half or three-quarters of an hour. To make it certain, I will say that I will be content with one hour.

Mr. RAY of New York. And the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] may have two.

Mr. LANHAM. Certainly.

Mr. RAY of New York. Then I ask unanimous consent that general debate be closed in three hours, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] to have one hour and our side two hours.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the general debate upon this bill close to-morrow in three hours, one hour to be controlled by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] and two hours by the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAY of New York. I move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York moves that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. DALZELL having assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. GROSVENOR, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (S. 3653) and had come to no resolution thereon.

HELEN A. B. DU BARRY.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report, to be printed in the RECORD, under the rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee submits a conference report, which will be printed in the RECORD, with the statement, under the rule.

The conference report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 1037) granting an increase of pension to Helen A. B. DuBarry, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the House recede from its amendment.

C. A. SULLOWAY,
HENRY R. GIBSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

J. H. GALLINGER,
J. R. BURTON,
T. M. PATTERSON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement of the House conferees is as follows:

The bill (S. 1037) granting an increase of pension to Helen A. B. DuBarry, passed the Senate at $50. The House amended the same by striking out $50 and inserting $40.

The result of the conference is that the House recedes from its amendment, leaving the bill as it passed the Senate.

C. A. SULLOWAY,
HENRY R. GIBSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

FRANCES L. ACKLEY.

Mr. RUMPLE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a conference report, to be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa presents a conference report, which will be printed in the RECORD, with the statement, under the rule.

The conference report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9290) granting a pension to Frances L. Ackley, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment.

J. N. W. RUMPLE,
ELIAS DEEMER,
Managers on the part of the House.

J. H. GALLINGER,
GEORGE TURNER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement is as follows:

The House bill (H. R. 9290) granting a pension to Frances L. Ackley passed the House at $20. The Senate amended by striking out "$20" and inserting "$12."

The result of the conference is that the Senate recedes from its amendment, leaving the bill as it passed the House.

J. N. W. RUMPLE.
ELIAS DEEMER.
Managers on the part of the House.

ALLEGED SUPPLY CAMP IN LOUISIANA.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

In response to the resolution of the House of Representatives of June 2, 1902, requesting the President "to send to the House of Representatives, if not incompatible with the interests of the public service, full information of the investigation recently made by his order as to the alleged supply camp in the State of Louisiana for the collection and shipment to South Africa of military supplies, including horses and mules," I transmit herewith a copy of the report from Colonel Crowder, the officer who made the investigation referred to, and a copy of a letter which, by my direction, the Secretary of State addressed on the 3d of this month to the governor of Louisiana, being an answer to a communication from Governor Heard, in which he charged certain violations of the neutrality laws of the United States at the port of Chalmette, La., which communication, with its inclosures, has already been laid before the House of Representatives in compliance with its resolution of April 10, 1902, and is printed in House Document No. 568, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

WHITE HOUSE, June 5, 1902.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 12346. An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes;

H. R. 9597. An act for the relief of Thierman & Frost; and

H. R. 720. An act for the relief of Lieut. Jerome E. Morse.

SENATE BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills and joint resolution of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. 909. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to extend the free-delivery system of the Post-Office Department, and for other purposes," approved January 3, 1887—to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

S. 5212. An act granting to the State of California 640 acres of land in lieu of section 16, township 7 south, range 8 east, San Bernardino meridian, State of California, now occupied by the Torros band or village of Mission Indians—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

S. 679. An act directing the issue of a check in lieu of a lost check drawn by Capt. E. O. Fechét, disbursing officer United States Signal Service Corps, in favor of the Bishop Gutta Percha Company—to the Committee on Claims.

S. 5968. An act to authorize the promotion and retirement of the present senior major-general of the Army—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

S. R. 110. Joint resolution empowering the State of Minnesota to file selections of indemnity school lands upon public lands in Minnesota otherwise undisposed of, after the survey thereof in the field and prior to the approval and filing of the plat of survey thereof—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. BURTON, for six days, on account of sickness.

To Mr. GAINES of West Virginia, for two days, on account of important business.

To Mr. ALLEN of Maine, for seven days, on account of important business.

PROTECTION OF THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, it was agreed in Committee of the Whole that general debate on the bill (S. 3653) be closed to-morrow in three hours, one hour to be controlled by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM], and the other two hours by the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary. I ask that that be confirmed in the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that general debate be closed upon the bill in three hours, one hour to be controlled by the gentleman from Texas and two hours by the gentleman from New York. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that I do not desire to interpose any objection, but as to-morrow is the day devoted to the consideration of war claims, I wish to notify the House that at some time I will ask another day to be given that committee.

Mr. RAY of New York. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

And accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury requesting additional appropriation for stationery for the Department—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Attorney-General submitting an estimate of appropriation for certain deficiency expenditures—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Secretary of State submitting an estimate of appropriation for expenses of arbitration in the matter of "The Pious Fund of the Californias"—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to the inquiry of the House, copies of communications between the Navy Department and Rear Admiral Kempff, in relation to the bombardment of the Taku forts in China—to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Acting Secretary of War, transmitting, with favorable recommendation, papers relating to the claim of the Alaska Commercial Company—to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. THOMAS of Iowa, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 12717) to provide for signing and settling bills of exceptions in certain cases, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2347); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 14441) to authorize the Secretary of War, in his discretion, to favor American-built ships in the transportation of Government supplies to the Philippines, across the Pacific Ocean, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2348); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, Mr. DEEMER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 1531) granting an increase of pension to Susan E. Duncan, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2346); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9303) for the relief of the Mobile and Ohio Railroad Company, and the same was referred to the Committee on Claims.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials of the following titles were introduced and severally referred, as follows:

By Mr. RODEY: A bill (H. R. 14921) enabling the Territory of New Mexico to use lands heretofore granted thereto in aid of irrigation and construction of reservoirs therein—to the Committee on the Territories.

By Mr. BOWERSOCK: A bill (H. R. 14922) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River, at a point to be selected, within 5 miles north of the mouth of the Kaw River, in Wyandotte County, State of Kansas, and Clay County, State of Missouri, and to make the same a post route, and for other purposes—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Frank Hatton, First Assistant Postmaster-General, in a declaration as to intent, meaning, and requirement of said statutes furnished for publication to the press through Chief Clerk Walker on February 16, 1884, and printed as exhibit, Senate Executive Document No. 146, Forty-ninth Congress, first session.

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE.

Mr. NELSON. On January 9 I submitted, from the Committee on Commerce, a report to accompany the bill (S. 569) to establish the department of commerce. I find that that print of the report is exhausted, and I ask that it be reprinted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota asks for a reprint of a report made by him from the Committee on Commerce. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

HEARINGS BEFORE COMMITTEE ON NAVAL AFFAIRS.

Mr. HALE. I present hearings before the Committee on Naval Affairs relative to an increase in the staff corps of the Navy, and also in regard to submarine boats. I move that the hearings be printed as a document.

The motion was agreed to.

JOSEPH W. CARMACK.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the bill (S. 20) for the relief of Joseph W. Carmack, returned from the House of Representatives in compliance with the request of the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that the votes by which the bill was passed may be reconsidered, and that the bill be indefinitely postponed. The payment is already provided for in the omnibus claims bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the order will be made.

JOHN S. NEET, JR.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the bill (S. 21) for the relief of John S. Neet, jr., returned from the House of Representatives in compliance with the request of the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask for the same order, for the same reason.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the votes by which the bill was passed will be reconsidered and the bill indefinitely postponed.

EZRA S. HAVENS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the bill (S. 22) for the relief of Ezra S. Havens, returned from the House of Representatives in compliance with the request of the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask for the same order in regard to this bill. Payment in all these cases has been provided for in the omnibus claims bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri asks for the same order in this case. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

EARTHQUAKES AND RIOTS ON PANAMA CANAL ROUTE.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I have a letter from the Secretary of State in response to one which I, as chairman of the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, addressed to him. I desire to have the letter and accompanying papers read at the desk, and I will then make a motion in regard to the disposition of them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, June 5, 1902.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letters of May 31 and June 2, 1902, requesting copies of certain records of the Department in regard to earthquakes and riots in Panama, Colombia.

In reply I inclose herewith a copy of a dispatch from the former vice-consul of the United States at Panama, transmitting newspaper clippings in regard to the earthquake there in 1882:

The records on the subject of the riot in Panama in 1856 will make about 1,000 pages of typewriting, and with our available force it will be impossible to furnish copies of these records within a month.

Referring to your letter of the 3d instant, I have to say that the Department's records contain nothing at all with reference to a proposition by Colombian authorities respecting annexation.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

JOHN HAY.

Hon. JOHN T. MORGAN,
United States Senate.

UNITED STATES CONSULATE,
Panama, September 14, 1882.

Hon. WILLIAM HUNTER,
Second Assistant Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

SIR: By this mail I forward to the Department a copy of the weekly edition of the Star and Herald of to-day's date, which contains a full and graphic account of the severe earthquake which visited this city on the 7th instant at 3.25 o'clock a. m.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

ROBERT W. TURPIN,
Vice-Consul.

[Star and Herald, September 14, 1882.]

SEVERE EARTHQUAKE ON THE ISTHMUS—MUCH DAMAGE DONE.

During the past week the Isthmus has been visited by several earthquakes which have done damage, but which, fortunately, have caused only two deaths. The following, copied from the daily Star and Herald, describes the events as they occurred from day to day:

[Daily Star and Herald, September 8.]

On Thursday, 7th instant, at 3.20 in the morning, the inhabitants of Panama were aroused from their beds by one of the longest and most severe earthquake shocks which has ever been experienced in this city. It was preceded by a hollow rumbling noise which aroused and alarmed many persons. The motion was wave-like and proceeded almost directly from north to south.

The first and most severe shock must have lasted at least thirty seconds. Commencing with a moderate movement it deepened in intensity, and toward the finish was so violent in strength that had it lasted ten seconds longer it is probable that at this moment there would not be a house standing in Panama. The shock had hardly terminated when the streets were filled with people, many of whom sought the outskirts of the town in order to avoid danger from the fall of edifices. A second and milder shock occurred about half an hour after the first one.

It is almost impossible to depict the alarm and excitement which followed. Panama has always been considered exempt from the mighty natural convulsions which are experienced almost periodically in the countries through which the giant Cordillera stretches its mountainous and volcanic ridges. That the shocks this morning were of exceptional violence appears to indicate a terrible calamity in some of those districts, and in all probability in the north, rather than a possibility that the old-time freedom of the Isthmus from earthquakes is about to disappear, and that henceforth we are to be subject to such dangerous and fearful visitations as those which on that morning threatened the city with ruin.

The amount of damage done can not as yet be estimated, but it must amount to at least $250,000. The municipal building and assembly rooms, under which the Cascada is situated, were much damaged. The whole of the massive balcony fell bodily into the square, dragging with it the roof and all adjacent timber.

The cathedral also suffered severely. Almost the whole of the ornate pediment, composed of heavy blocks of masonry, fell through the roof or onto the steps leading to the principal entrance. Every arch in the nave is cracked and split, and large stones and pieces of cement have fallen from them. The side aisles are also seriously damaged, and an expenditure of at least $50,000 will be required to restore the building The roof of the assembly room will be repaired at an early date, Governor Borbua having acted with remarkable celerity and commenced work at once, in order that the archives and furniture may not be exposed to damage from rain.

Private houses damaged are innumerable, and owners as yet fail to form a correct idea of the losses they have incurred. The walls of the canal office are cracked in several places, and the edifice requires strengthening. No estimate of damage can be made, but an expenditure of several thousand dollars must be incurred to render the building as safe as it was before the shock.

The ruins of buildings destroyed by fire are, unfortunately, too conspicuous in the center of the city. Their danger has frequently been pointed out, and the earthquake has now accentuated the peril consequent on their being allowed to remain as heretofore. Masses of these ruins have fallen down, and gaping cracks prove the necessity that they should be torn down. Outside the city a number of houses have suffered. The tower of Malambo Church has fallen, and a piece several yards square of the roof of Santa Ana Church has tumbled in. The crash among glassware and bottles has been universal, Mr. Brakemeier alone being a loser to the extent of $2,000 from this cause. General Aizpuru's house in the Calle Real has suffered severely, as has also that of Don Manuel Hurtado, in front of the Government house. Others who have suffered damage are Señores Antonio Jimenez, Agustin Clement, Jose Manuel Casis, Barsallo, and the Grand Hotel, but the full extent of the damage done will not be known until the investigating committee has concluded its labors.

Several hours have now elapsed and there has been no repetition of the shocks. It may, therefore, be confidently anticipated that they will not be repeated.

The Pacific Mail steamship Clyde arrived from San Francisco on the night, 6th. The earthquake was severely felt on board. Passengers declare that it appeared as if the vessel were lifted bodily from the sea and allowed to fall back.

Thanks to the kindness of Mr. J. B. Stearns, general manager of the Central and South American Cable Company, we are able to inform our readers that the offices at Buenaventura in Cauca, and San Juan del Sur in Nicaragua, announce that no shock has been felt in either of those ports. The cable is working excellently and gives no sign that a general volcanic disturbance has taken place.

The effects of the earthquake along the railroad have been most marked. The stone abutments of several of the bridges have been cracked and split, and the earthwork has sunk in a half a dozen places. Gangs of men were put at work on Thursday, so that traffic might be resumed as usual at the earliest possible day. Mr. Woods and his subordinates have been active and energetic as usual, and cars were busily employed loading ballast to fill the sunken places, whilst lumber was being cut and prepared to support the short bridges which have been weakened, as already mentioned, through the cracking of the abutments.

All along the railroad track the earthquake was severely felt. At Emperador, Gatun, Matachin, and all the canal stations much alarm was created.

In several places where the direct action of the shock appears to have made itself most strongly felt the rails were curved, as if they had been intentionally bent.

Mr. Woods, general superintendent of the railway, went across the same morning and returned as far as Bailamona in the afternoon. Neither train crossed in the afternoon. The Panama train stopped on this side of Bailamona bridge and the passengers and their baggage were transferred to hand and push cars and thus conveyed 8 miles over the road to Bohio Soldado—the farthest point the train from Colon could reach.

The earthquake created great alarm in Colon. The freight house was damaged and it was rumored that one or two were killed, but no certain information on this point has been obtainable. It is known, however, that two gentlemen broke their legs through jumping from the upper stories of houses.

The telegraph wire was down during the early part of the day, but communication was reestablished at about 4 p. m.

The sea was remarkably calm at Colon at the time of the severe shock, thus tending to prove that the earth motion has not extended, as at first supposed, to the West Indies.

The passengers and mails per Royal Mail steamer Don could not come across yesterday, so that the Lima, after being delayed a day, had to leave for the South without them.

Mother Earth on the Isthmus has not as yet returned to her ordinary quiescent condition. The severe shock of the morning of the 7th has been followed by several of less intensity, but which do not appear to make their effects felt over such a wide area. On Thursday afternoon several vibrations were experienced in different localities which were not felt in Panama.

At 11.30 p. m. on the 7th a sharp shock alarmed the whole city, and drove the people from their houses to the squares. Hundreds of ladies accustomed to every convenience and comfort preferred to pass the night on mattresses, couches, and chairs in the public plazas to running the risk of being crushed to death in the houses. The inconveniences of the situation they thus accepted were obvious to the less timid who walked from one square to another to see these temporary and uncampaignlike encampments.

A slighter shock occurred at about 3 in the morning, but fortunately neither it nor its predecessor added further ruin to that already incurred in the city.

All the shocks have been felt on the islands in the bay, and some houses have suffered at Taboga.

La Chorrera has been very unfortunate. The church and the cemetery are a mass of ruins, and a number of houses have fallen. A bakery took fire and it and the adjoining house were totally destroyed by fire.

Between Gavilan and Punta Mala in the vicinity of this city a crevasse has opened which is 10 meters in width.

Some of the ruinous walls are being taken down, but there are several yet standing which are a permanent menace to adjoining properties and the lives of their inhabitants.

[Colon correspondence Daily Star and Herald, September 9.]

On the morning of September 7 at about 3.15 the residents of Colon were aroused from their peaceful slumber by the earthquake shock which has caused so much alarm and so considerable damage to the whole Isthmus. The duration of the shock was fully sixty seconds, and was so severe that the whole populace rushed from their domiciles into the streets as rapidly as their feet could carry them.

The greatest alarm prevailed. About a half hour afterwards another shock was felt, but much lighter than the first. The sensation produced by the first and more violent shock was that the whole town was about to sink into the bowels of the earth. No very considerable damage was done. Several buildings were more or less damaged, including the French consulate, the house of Mr. F. R. Cowan, the Panama Railroad freight house, and the wharves, the International Hotel, some smaller tenements in the rear of the town in the alley known as Cash street. One of the latter, built of brick and wood in the style known as brick noggin, was wrecked completely, and one unfortunate occupant, a native, was killed; two others, one a Frenchman and the other a bookkeeper for Messrs. Isaacs & Asch, had each a leg broken in their haste to escape. The former will have to submit to the painful operation of amputation.

A deep fissure was opened in the earth from the south end of the freight house for a distance of about 400 feet along the walk leading in the direction of the ice houses. Many buildings were moved slightly from their foundations, but on the whole remarkably little damage was done. On board the vessels in the harbor the shock was also felt very severely.

The losses sustained were principally in the breakage of bottles in the various stores and shops and the smashing of crockery, mirrors, etc., in private residences. This is pronounced the most severe shaking up ever before experienced in the history of the country since the discovery and conquest; but on the whole the town has escaped without serious injury. On the 7th instant, about 1 p. m., another much slighter shock was felt, and during the night of the same day two more slight disturbances were reported. The people of the town have become quite alarmed and quite demoralized by these events, many rushing to the churches and calling upon God for protection and deliverance. If the result proves beneficial to the moral tone of the city, the tonic, although severe, may not be regretted.

It may be of meteorological interest to observe that the sea at the time remained here calm, the atmosphere quite clear, and the stars and waning moon remarkably brilliant. Soon after, say about 4 o'clock, a slight fog wafted from inland; no rain fell. All day an ominous calm prevailed without rain, with fluctuating barometer and excessive heat, which led many to fear a return of the shocks during the night of the 7th, and few slept. But with the slight exceptions noted, all remained quiet.

Another correspondent writes from Colon:

"At about 10 minutes past 3 this morning we experienced the most horrible earthquake that I ever felt in my life. The damage done I can not estimate. A German employed as bookkeeper by Messrs. Isaacs & Asch threw himself out of the window and broke his leg, and a colored man followed his example with a similar result. Two men have been killed, one of them being buried under a falling roof. The whole of the made ground between the wharves and the lagoon is split in a number of places.

"A number of houses have suffered severely. Some have fallen down bodily. No. 4 mole and the freight house has been damaged. All here think the motion lasted at least one minute and that it moved from the southeast toward the northwest."

[Daily Star and Herald, September 11.]

A slight earthquake shock occurred on the morning of the 9th a little before 5 o'clock. Much alarm was naturally created, but fortunately no damage was done. The frequent repetition of these movements causes a painful and uneasy feeling among the populace. A number of families passed the night on board the vessels in the bay and many in the public squares, and on Saturday a great many occupied the light cane houses on the outskirts of the city and at the savanna.

The same shock was lightly felt in Colon and along the railroad track. No damage was done, and work was continued on the houses injured by the shock of the 7th instant.

All day on Saturday no shock was felt, and the night passed quietly. At midday on Saturday there was a marked change in the atmosphere, and with a refreshing shower which fell the murky, sultry air of the previous days entirely disappeared.

The rumor of a volcanic eruption at the town and fort of Chagres is pronounced entirely false. Thoroughly reliable persons were there at 1 p. m. on Saturday and reached Colon the same evening. They report the earthquake to have been felt there, and that the earth had cracked slightly in two or three places. Beyond this no damage was done.

The shocks have been lightly felt on board the vessels in the bay, but they have experienced absolutely none of the tidal-wave effects which so frequently accompany widespread and powerful convulsions.

Passenger and freight trains will run over the road to-day as usual, as it is believed all the breaks will have been thoroughly repaired last evening.

The earthquake destroyed the little church at Cruces and damaged a few houses.

The rumors of a volcanic eruption at Chagres are entirely without foundation. The earthquake was felt there, did some little damage, and opened a few cracks in the ground.

A cablegram received from Mr. Schrymser, the president of the Central American Cable Company, announces that in New York it was known the Colon cable was broken and that nothing had occurred in Cuba and the other islands.

A commission of canal employees left Panama on Sunday afternoon and proceeded to Chagres to inspect the ground where the volcanic eruption is said to have taken place. A photographer accompanies them in order to obtain exact representations of any physical changes which may have occurred. The principal members of it are MM. Canel, Alvo, and Canell. It is believed they will be absent about a fortnight, as they have to examine a wide field.

The rumors of the volcanic eruptions near Chagres and Cruces are declared to be entirely false by people arrived from there. One or two persons declare, however, that at 20 miles from Chagres, in the direction of "the coast," a small mud volcano has been observed, but these statements are as untrustworthy and false as the many which have been set current within the past few days.

The truth of the matter appears to be that the repeated shocks have settled the loose alluvial soil and that subsidence has occurred in several places, leaving fissures in some, and in others ejecting the thin mud formed on the lower strata by the percolation of water. All the fissures observed so far present the same characteristics and appear to be formed in the manner described and not by volcanic rents originating in the bowels of the earth.

The bridges on the railroad are now fully repaired, and freight and passenger trains crossed as usual yesterday.

More rain is falling at Colon and on the other side of the Isthmus than on the Panama side.

Three old and valueless ranches fell at Gatun when the severe shock of the 7th took place. A beam from one of them struck and instantly killed a poor woman who was asleep.

A number of people have walked, ridden, and canoed through the center of the Isthmus in order to discover the supposed volcanic center. Their labor has been valueless, and all have returned convinced that no excessively severe motion has been experienced in any part. No loss of life has occurred, save the three cases we have reported.

[Daily Star and Herald, September 13.]

The earthquake of the 7th instant was felt at the Pearl Islands in the bay. At San Miguel one of the walls of the church fell in, and the inhabitants took the saints out and carried them in procession in the hope of preventing the repetition of the convulsion. They were panic stricken. A correspondent writes that the earth continued moving for five minutes, but this must be incorrect.

At Donoso, Govea, and Rio Indio a number of shocks have been felt, and the people have been much frightened. At Miguel la Borda, 35 miles from Colon, in the direction of Bocas del Toro, the tide rose to an unusual height and flooded some of the houses which are built on the beach almost on a level with the sea. The earth is said to have sunk in about a dozen places and that cattle have been lost from this cause. The governor of the district writes officially that several boiling springs have suddenly appeared, some of which throw hot water to a considerable height. Although official, this report lacks confirmation.

Many people believe they felt shocks in Panama during the night of the 11th instant, but the majority declare no movement took place. Overexcitement in many cases induces the belief that the earth is trembling, and the least sound, such as a heavy cart passing through the streets, is at once converted by the excitable into the commencement of a catastrophe.

A number of houses in Colon have suffered. A list is being drawn up. The heavy stone offices of the canal company have been badly cracked, and the employees are removing the desks, etc., to another building. The International Hotel, one of the largest buildings in Colon, has been somewhat damaged, but the trivial nature of the injury in such an extensive edifice seems to prove that good brickwork can resist movements which seriously injure houses which have been cheaply constructed. The moles in front of the freight house and the made ground at the back of it show signs of the movement, but the heavy stone walls of the building although cracked in some places are sound and good, while the iron trestle work which sustains the roof and holds the walls together is as tight and plumb as the day it was put together. Many frame houses have sagged over in different directions. The majority of these houses were never remarkable for symmetry; now they zigzag one way and the other and give the town a most peculiar appearance. It must be remembered there are a number of frame buildings in Colon which were run up as the earth was dumped into the sea to form the spit on which the town stands, and that consequently it is not surprising if the slightest shake should affect these frail wooden structures which have been exposed during nearly thirty years to the vicissitudes of the variable tropical climate.

The bronze statue of Christopher Columbus was shaken free from the stone pedestal on which it stands and moved about 4 inches from its former location. It can be readjusted at slight cost.

At 6 a. m. yesterday morning the rain was pouring down in torrents in Colon.

The Harrison steamer Mediator has arrived at Colon and reports that a slight shock of earthquake was felt in Carthagena on the morning of the 7th. No damage was done. Letters from there dated the 9th scarcely mention the occurrence, thus proving the little importance attached to it.

Letters have been received from the towns of La Villa, Chitre, Macaracas, and Nata, all in this State, announcing that several shocks have been felt, but that the material of which the houses are built—bamboos and adobes—resisted the movements and have suffered no damage. At La Villa the bells in the church rang several times. The people do not appear to have been so alarmed as they have been in other parts of the Isthmus.

Messrs. Schuber Brothers' steamer Cargador, from ports in the northern departments of the State of Panama, arrived yesterday, reports that repeated earthquakes have been felt, but that no damage to life or property has followed:

The canal commissioners, sent to examine, reported volcanic effects in the center of the Isthmus; have telegraphed that they are unable to find traces proving that the shocks have been sharper there than anywhere else in the State.

Two or three slight tremblings were experienced in this city during the night of the 12th, but they caused no alarm. Many people are returning to their houses.

Mr. MORGAN. The Secretary of State in his letter mentions that it would require a month to copy the accounts of the riots at Colon in a certain year which is mentioned there.

Mr. HALE. Before this matter passes from the consideration of the Senate, I wish the Senator would tell us, as there was so much confusion in the Chamber I could not understand, what the paper is which has been read. Who is it from?

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Turpin, consul at Panama in 1882, made this report on the 14th day of September of that year to the Secretary of State, and the Secretary of State has sent it in here at my request, as chairman of the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

Mr. HALE. It is a communication from the State Department submitting a report made by the consul in the year 1882——

Mr. MORGAN. In 1882.

Mr. HALE. Of what took place?

Mr. MORGAN. At that time.

Mr. HALE. At that time?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. HALE. In September, 1882?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; September 7. That is what it is.

Mr. HALE. A report of earthquakes in Panama?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; at Colon and other places up the coast.

Mr. HALE. In that region?

Mr. MORGAN. At Bocas del Toro and other places.

Mr. HALE. I did not know the authority of it. I could not gain it from what I heard.

Mr. MORGAN. It is an official paper.

Now, Mr. President, I desire to have the paper printed as a document and referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, so that they may determine whether it is better to ask the Secretary of State to send in that month's work or not. I make that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the paper which has been read be printed as a document. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the order is made. It will be referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

HATTIE M. WHITNEY.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 4927) granting an increase of pension to Hattie M. Whitney, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House, and agree to the same.

J. H. GALLINGER,
N. B. SCOTT,
JAMES P. TALIAFERRO,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

H. C. LOUDENSLAGER,
J. H. BROMWELL,
WILLIAM RICHARDSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

GEORGE C. TILLMAN.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to bill (S. 4071) granting an increase of pension to George C. Tillman, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows:

In lieu of the sum proposed by the House insert "twenty," and the House agree to the same.

J. H. GALLINGER,
WILLIAM J. DEBOE,
E. W. CARMACK,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

H. C. LOUDENSLAGER,
J. H. BROMWELL,
WILLIAM RICHARDSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

GEORGE W. BARRY.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9544) granting an increase of pension to George W. Barry, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate.

J. H. GALLINGER,
N. B. SCOTT,
T. M. PATTERSON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

C. A. SULLOWAY,
HENRY R. GIBSON,
RUDOLPH KLEBERG,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

THE RIO GRANDE RIVER.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, in 1898 a resolution was passed requesting the President to certify certain documents in the State Department concerning the Butte Dam controversy. A response was made to that on April 7. There are numerous letters of various kinds on file that ought to be transmitted to the Senate for the benefit of the litigants engaged in the case between the State of Colorado and the State of Kansas. I send to the desk a resolution asking for a report, and specifying the particular papers we desire to have certified. I have examined the matter, and they appear to be papers that may be wanted for use in the case. It is a mere formal request, specifying the papers that are desired.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution submitted by the Senator from Colorado will be read.

The resolution was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Whereas the Senate, by resolution dated February 26, 1898, called upon the President:

"If not incompatible with the public interest, to transmit to the Senate the proceedings of the international commission authorized in the concurrent resolution of Congress of April 29, 1890, and a subsequent international convention between the United States and Mexico of May 6, 1896, and also the correspondence relating thereto with Mexico by the Department of the Interior, Department of War, and Department of Justice, as well as the Department of State, relating to the equitable distribution of the waters of the Rio Grande River, including the draft of an incomplete treaty between said Governments, negotiated between the late Secretary of State, Mr. Olney, on the part of the United States, and Mr. Romero, on the part of Mexico, and all the correspondence between said officials relating thereto;" and

Whereas the President, by his letter of April 7, 1898, transmitted to the Senate, in response to said resolution, copies of certain reports, letters, documents, and maps, which were ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and are now on its files as Senate Document No. 229; and

Whereas it is alleged that there are other important letters and documents in the several departments of the General Government which specifically relate to and bear upon the matter involved in said resolution: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the President is hereby requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to transmit to the Senate any and all other letters, opinions, briefs, and documents, not now embraced in Senate Document No. 229, but relating to the equitable distribution of the waters of the Rio Grande and to the incomplete treaty set out in said document, and especially to transmit to the Senate copies of—

1. Note of Mexican minister to Secretary of State, under date of October 21, 1895.

2. Letter of Secretary of State to Attorney-General, under date November 5, 1895, inclosing copy of said note of Mexican minister to the Secretary of State, and requesting the opinion of the Attorney-General as to the legal rights of Mexico, and as to the obligations of the United States under its treaties with Mexico.

3. The letter of the Attorney-General, under date of December 12, 1895, in response to said letter of the Secretary of State.

4. Letter of Hon. H. B. Ferguson to the Secretary of State in opposition to any treaty with Mexico that would deprive the inhabitants of New Mexico of the fullest use of the waters of the Rio Grande.

5. The paper prepared by the Assistant Attorney-General setting forth the claims and contentions of the Rio Grande Dam and Irrigation Company and discussing the laws of Colorado and New Mexico relating to water and the acts of Congress and rulings of the Department of the Interior regarding irrigation, mentioned by the Secretary of the Interior in his letter to the Secretary of State, dated December 19, 1896, found on page 17, of Senate Document No. 229, and which is there noted as "omitted."

6. Letter from Secretary of State to Col. Anson Mills, of August 8, 1896; from Colonel Mills to the Secretary of State, of October 29, 1896, and from the Secretary of State to the Secretary of the Interior, of October 31, 1896; all relating to the proposed dam of the Rio Grande Dam and Irrigation Company and the use of the water of the said Rio Grande.

7. Letter on the same subject from Secretary of State to Secretary of Interior, of November 30, 1896.

8. Statement and argument of J. H. McGowan and Holcomb & Keegin, as the attorneys of said Rio Grande Dam and Irrigation Company, in opposition to said proposed treaty, which paper was duly filed with the Secretary of State after said attorneys had entered their appearance in the Department on behalf of said irrigation company; also the accompanying copy of Mr. McGowan's letter of May 16, 1896, to the Hon. Cushman K. Davis, chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations.

9. Letters to the Secretary of State from Dr. Nathan Boyd, one dated December 21, 1900, and one dated May 26, 1902; also the statement by Dr. Boyd in re the international (El Paso) dam project, and the exhibits thereto filed with the last-mentioned letter, and dated May 26, 1902.

10. Letter dated August 8, 1900, from the Hon. A. A. Adee, Acting Secretary of State, to Dr. Boyd, and letter dated August 28, 1900, to the Hon. A. A. Adee, Acting Secretary of State, from Dr. Boyd.

11. Letter from John L. Campbell, esq., to the Hon. J. W. Griggs, United States Attorney-General, dated December 28, 1900.

12. Letter from Prof. Robert T. Hill to the Hon. D. J. Hill, First Assistant Secretary of State, dated September 7, 1900.

13. Letter dated March 5, 1902, from the Hon. B. S. RODEY to the Secretary of State; also the brief mentioned therein.

TELEPHONE SERVICE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. GALLINGER. On the 29th of last month I reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia the bill (H. R. 12865) regulating the use of telephone wires in the District of Columbia. Since then I have received communications from citizens of the Northwest Suburban Association and from various other citizens of the District, and have been waited upon by at least two Senators who say that it is very important for their convenience that this bill shall be passed during the present session of Congress. I notice that the time to-day and to-morrow after the routine morning business is to be pretty fully occupied, and I give notice that on Monday next, after the routine morning business, I shall move to take up the bill for consideration.

ELECTION OF UNITED STATES SENATORS.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, some days ago the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WELLINGTON] made a motion that the Committee on Privileges and Elections be discharged from the further consideration of the joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States authorizing the election of Senators by the people. The subject has gone over from day to day with a unanimous-consent understanding that it should not lose its place, and the resolution is now in order, as I understand, under that agreement.

The Senator from Maryland is not here; but I desire to say, Mr. President, that I should like to have the resolution taken up and considered and a vote had upon it by the Senate. I do not propose to discuss it. Every Senator knows all about it. The Committee on Privileges and Elections have had the joint resolution in charge for more than six months, and has made no report. The subject has been brought before the Senate twice before and a report was promised. The chairman of the committee finally reported that the committee were unable to agree on any kind of a report, either favorable or adverse. I should like to have a vote on the resolution.

Mr. HALE. Has the Senator noticed that the Committee on Privileges and Elections, before whom this subject has been, is not present either by its chairman or certain other members who have been very considerably interested in the matter. I hope the Senator will not now ask that the resolution be taken up in their absence.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, I had not noticed the absence of the chairman of the committee, but the chairman of the committee is in favor of the joint resolution, which was referred to the committee, and has done everything in his power to secure a report upon it. There are certain other Senators—at least some of those to whom the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] refers—who have, in my judgment, done everything in their power to delay and prevent a report being made. It has been openly avowed on the Senate floor, I think, by at least one Senator that every effort would be made to defeat the joint resolution.

After a committee has had a joint resolution before it for six months, when a motion was made weeks ago to discharge the committee from its further consideration, when the promise was made that we were to have a report very soon, and when four weeks before that time another promise had been made, and then the chairman of the committee came in on the floor of this Senate and said that the committee had voted down a proposition to report the joint resolution favorably, had voted down the proposition to report it adversely, had voted down the proposition to report it with amendment, and had voted down the proposition to report it without amendment, it seems to me there can be no reason for longer keeping that joint resolution before that committee, unless the reason be to prevent its going on the Calendar so that a vote can be had upon it.

I would say to the Senator from Maine that under ordinary circumstances I should be the last man to ask for a vote upon any measure in the Senate in the absence of Senators who are especially interested in it.

Mr. HALE. The Senator has followed the deviations and sinuosities, the height and the depth of the different performances in relation to this resolution much more closely than I have, and I presume, for his memory is retentive and accurate, that he has stated all these points of difference correctly; but all the same I do not think the Senator will insist on the consideration of the subject in the absence of the chairman or other Senators of the committee. I do not know whether the Senator is a member of the committee.

Mr. BERRY. No, I am not; but I introduced the resolution discharging the committee from the further consideration of the subject on the 8th of May; and I introduced a resolution to amend the Constitution on the second day of the session, which was referred to the committee; and therefore I am interested in it.

Mr. HALE. It is the Senator's resolution, unquestionably.

Mr. BERRY. I did not hear the Senator.

Mr. HALE. I say the paternity of the resolution is unquestioned. There is a very thin Senate, and in the absence of Senators who are interested in the matter—I do not know what they would desire to say; I do not know but that——

Mr. BERRY. If the Senator will permit me, the resolution comes up as a matter of right. It went over by unanimous consent on account of the agreement to vote on the Philippine bill, which we passed a few days ago, and it now becomes the duty of the Chair to lay the resolution before the Senate after the conclusion of the routine morning business. I will ask unanimous consent that the resolution retain its place without losing any advantage, so that the Chair can lay it before the Senate to-morrow morning; and I give notice now that I shall make an effort to secure the consideration of the resolution at that time.

Mr. HALE. The Senator, of course, will follow his own judgment; but I suggest that not only the chairman of the committee is absent, but the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], who has a substitute—a very important one—is absent for a few days.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. And also the Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW].

Mr. BERRY. In regard to the Senator from Massachusetts, I am informed that he has gone home and will probably not be back during the remainder of this session.

Mr. HALE. I do not think it possible that the senior Senator from Massachusetts will be absent if he knows that this important question is to come up. The Senator need not give himself trouble about that.

Mr. BERRY. The Senator from Massachusetts well knows that some Senators here will bring up the resolution if possible, and he also well knows that he is not anxious to have the resolution considered.

Mr. HALE. What I was going to suggest to the Senator was, simply in the doing of business in the fashion in which we do it here, that, instead of saying he will urge this resolution to-morrow, let him give notice that he will call it up on some early day next week—Tuesday, if he chooses—so that an opportunity may be given for those Senators who are absent to come here, if they choose, knowing that the resolution will come up, to be here on Tuesday or Wednesday of next week—perhaps Wednesday would answer better. Let the Senator give notice that he will move to take up the resolution then, and let it keep its place on the Calendar.

Mr. BERRY. The friends of the joint resolution who are members of the committee, at least one of them, say they think we had better agree to that suggestion and let the resolution go over until next Wednesday morning.

Mr. HALE. So that an opportunity may be given to those absent Senators to be present who desire to be present.

Mr. BERRY. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY] asks unanimous consent that the joint resolution lie on the table, subject to be called up on Wednesday morning next. Is there objection?

Mr. MCCOMAS. Before that is done, I only want a moment to say that there are not many Senators now present, and, as has been stated by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], the chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections [Mr. BURROWS] is not present; the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], who has a substitute for the joint resolution, is not present, and I do not know that he will be, and the Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW], who proposed an amendment vital in this matter, is not present, and I do not know that he will be. Would it not be well, therefore, to let the matter go over until Monday, and then fix a day?

Mr. BERRY. No, Mr. President; I object to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to ask a question before we consent to the arrangement. This resolution, of course, will not interfere with the order of business at 2 o'clock, if it is taken up on Wednesday morning. The unanimous consent will only apply, as I understand, to the morning hour?

Mr. BERRY. So I understand it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair so understood the request.

Mr. ALLISON. I merely desire to have that understood.

Mr. MCCOMAS. My only anxiety is whether that will give sufficient time for the absent Senators to be present.

Mr. BLACKBURN. That is notice enough.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY]? The Chair hears none, and that order is made.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. What is the day?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Wednesday next, in the morning hour.

AGREEMENT WITH CREEK INDIANS.

Mr. STEWART. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 4923. It is the Creek treaty.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 4923) to ratify and confirm a supplemental agreement with the Creek tribe of Indians, and for other purposes; which had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with amendments.

Mr. STEWART. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that the bill be read for amendment, the committee amendments to be first considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nevada? The Chair hears none, and that order is made.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I dislike to hear an agreement of this sort called a treaty. Long ago, I think in 1871, Congress passed an act that we would make no more treaties with the Indian tribes. This is simply an agreement.

Mr. STEWART. Yes; an agreement.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I do not like to have it go into the RECORD that we are making treaties with Indian tribes, and therefore I want to call attention to it at this time.

Mr. STEWART. Let it be corrected in the RECORD.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill. The first amendment reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs was, on page 3, to strike out the quotation marks at the beginning and close of the clause from line 4 to line 14.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, to strike out the quotation marks at the beginning and close of the clause from line 18 to line 21.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, line 5, after the word "which," to strike out "included" and insert "include;" and in line 6, after the word "selected," to strike out "lands" and insert "land;" so as to make the clause read:

5. Where it is shown to the satisfaction of said Commission that it was the intention of a citizen to select lands which include his home and improvements, but that through error and mistake he had selected land which did not include said home and improvements, said Commission is authorized to cancel said selection and the certificate of selection or allotment embracing said lands, and permit said citizen to make a new selection including said home and improvements; and should said land including said home and improvements have been selected by any other citizen of said nation, the citizen owning said home and improvements shall be permitted to file, within ninety days from the ratification of this agreement, a contest against the citizen having previously selected the same and shall not be prejudiced therein by reason of lapse of time or any provision of law or rules and regulations to the contrary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, line 17, before the word "rods," to strike out "two" and insert "three;" and after the word "one," at the end of line 17, to strike out "rod" and insert "and one-half rods;" so as to make the clause read:

10. Public highways or roads 3 rods in width, being 1½ rods on each side of the section line, may be established along all section lines without any compensation being paid therefor; and all allottees, purchasers, and others shall take the title to such lands subject to this provision. And public highways or roads may be established elsewhere whenever necessary for the public good, the actual value of the land taken elsewhere than along section lines to be determined under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior while the tribal government continues, and to be paid by the Creek Nation during that time; and if buildings or other improvements are damaged in consequence of the establishment of such public highways or roads, whether along section lines or elsewhere, such damages, during the continuance of the tribal government, shall be determined and paid in the same manner.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, line 18, before the words "Stat. L., 861," to strike out "21" and insert "31;" and in line 23, after the words "approval of the," to strike out "plant" and insert "plat;" so as to make the clause read:

13. Whenever the town site surveyors of any town in the Creek Nation shall have selected and located a cemetery, as provided in section 18 of the act of Congress approved March 1, 1901 (31 Stat. L., 861), the town authorities shall not be authorized to dispose of lots in such cemetery until payment shall have been made to the Creek Nation for land used for said cemetery, as provided in said act of Congress, and if the town authorities fail or refuse to make payment as aforesaid within one year of the approval of the plat of said cemetery by the Secretary of the Interior, the land so reserved shall revert to the Creek Nation and be subject to allotment. And for lands heretofore or hereafter designated as parks upon any plat or any town site the town shall make payment into the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the Creek Nation within one year at the rate of $20 per acre, and if such payment be not made within that time the lands so designated as a park shall be platted into lots and sold as other town lots.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 9, after line 13, to strike out the following clause:

15. The reservation of 1 acre each for all churches and schoolhouses outside of towns now regularly used as such, provided for in the act of Congress approved March 1, 1901 (31 Stat. L., 861), shall be construed to mean 1 acre each for all churches under the control of and used exclusively by Creek citizens and 1 acre each for all Creek schools under the supervision of the authorities of the Creek Nation and officials of the United States, and the acre so reserved for any church or school in any quarter section of land shall be located in a corner of such quarter section lying adjacent to a section line hereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 10, line 7, after the word "obligation," to strike out "contracted or incurred prior to the date of the deed to the allottee therefor; and such lands shall not," and insert "nor;" so as to make the clause read:

17. Lands allotted to citizens hereunder shall not in any manner whatever or at any time be encumbered, taken, or sold to secure or satisfy any debt or obligation nor be alienated by the allottee or his heirs before the expiration of five years from the date of the deed therefor, except with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior. Each citizen shall select from his allotment 40 acres of land, or a quarter of a quarter section, as a homestead, which shall be and remain nontaxable, inalienable, and free from any incumbrance whatever for twenty-one years from the date of the deed therefor, and a separate deed shall be issued to each allottee for his homestead, in which this condition shall appear.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, line 17, after the word "exceed," to strike out "one year" and insert "three years;" in line 19, after the word "than," to strike out "one year" and insert "three years;" and on page 12, line 7, after the word "lands," to strike out:

Provided, That this section shall not be in force after the dissolution of the tribal government.

So as to read:

18. Section 37 of the agreement ratified by said act of March 1, 1901, is amended, and as so amended is reenacted to read as follows:

"During the continuance of the tribal government Creek citizens may rent their allotments, when selected for strictly nonmineral purposes, for a term not to exceed three years, but without any stipulation or obligation to renew the same. Such leases for a longer period than three years and leases for mineral purposes may also be made with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, and not otherwise. Any agreement or lease of any kind or character violative of this paragraph shall be absolutely void and not susceptible of ratification in any manner, and no rule of estoppel shall ever prevent the assertion of its invalidity. Cattle grazed upon leased allotments shall not be liable to any tribal tax, but when cattle are introduced into the Creek Nation and grazed on lands not selected for allotment by citizens, the Secretary of the Interior shall collect from the owners thereof a reasonable grazing tax for the benefit of the tribe, and section 2117 of the Revised Statutes of the United States shall not hereafter apply to Creek lands."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

UNIVERSITY OF ARIZONA.

Mr. HEITFELD. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 8736) ratifying the act of the Territorial legislature of Arizona, approved March 2, 1901, providing a fund for the erection of additional buildings for the University of Arizona.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LONDON DOCK CHARGES.

Mr. SIMMONS obtained the floor.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from North Carolina allow me to give a notice before he proceeds?

Mr. SIMMONS. I am going to occupy but a moment. However, I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to give notice that to-morrow, after the close of the routine morning business, I shall call up for consideration the bill (S. 1792) to amend an act entitled "An act relating to navigation of vessels, bills of lading, and to certain obligations, duties, and rights in connection with the carriage of property."

NATIONAL APPALACHIAN FOREST RESERVE.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, earlier in the week I gave notice that I should speak to-day upon the bill (S. 492) for the purchase of a national forest reserve in the Southern Appalachian Mountains. That was a mistake. It should have been the bill (S. 5228) for the purchase of a national forest reserve in the Southern Appalachian Mountains, to be known as the "National Appalachian Forest Reserve," which has been substituted by the Committee on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game for Senate bill 492. I would not have time now, before the expiration of the morning hour, to finish the remarks I desire to make, and I wish to give notice that I will speak on Monday, after the routine morning business, upon Senate bill 5228.

CHARLES H. ROBINSON.

Mr. KEAN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 949) for the relief of Charles H. Robinson.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that the sum of $720 be allowed to Charles H. Robinson, former pension agent at Des Moines, Iowa, being the sum deposited by him to cover a deficiency arising in his office, caused by the negligence of a clerk, and without blame or fault on the part of said Charles H. Robinson.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NORTH CAROLINA COLLEGE OF AGRICULTURE, ETC.

Mr. PRITCHARD. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (H. R. 10819) for the relief of George T. Winston, president of North Carolina College of Agriculture and Mechanic Arts, and W. S. Primrose, chairman board of trustees.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of War to relieve W. S. Primrose, chairman of the board of trustees, and George T. Winston, president of the North Carolina College of Agriculture and Mechanic Arts, Raleigh, N. C., from all money responsibility for so much of the ordnance and ordnance stores issued to the college under its bonds dated May 28, 1894, and February 18, 1901, as were destroyed by fire on November 29, 1901.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

READING MATTER FOR THE BLIND.

Mr. ELKINS. I should like to call up for present consideration the bill (S. 2644) to promote the circulation of reading matter among the blind, reported by the Post-Office Committee with an amendment suggested by the Post-Office Department.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from West Virginia asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill indicated by him, which was read to the Senate day before yesterday. Is there objection?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Was objection then made to it?

Mr. ELKINS. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] objected, the Chair thinks.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. If objection was made at a former meeting of the Senate, I think the bill ought to wait until the Senator from Maine is in his seat. We do not know whether it is a mere formal objection or whether it goes to the merits of the bill. I hope the Senator from West Virginia will not ask that the bill be taken up in the absence of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. ELKINS. All right.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. If it is a mere formal objection——

Mr. ELKINS. I think it goes to the subject-matter. I can not press the request if the Senator from Connecticut objects. The bill was unanimously reported by the committee.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I care nothing about it myself.

Mr. ELKINS. As I say, the bill has been unanimously reported from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. But I think we ought to be fair to the Senator who objected when the bill was up on another occasion.

Mr. ELKINS. How long shall I wait on him?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The Senator can have the bill passed at any time when the Senator from Maine is here, if the objection is not a vital one in his mind.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from West Virginia withdraw his request?

Mr. ELKINS. After the statement of the Senator from Connecticut, I will have to withdraw the request for the present.

CONSIDERATION OF PENSION BILLS, ETC.

Mr. GALLINGER. There are a large number of pension bills on the Calendar which Senators are pressing to have considered. There is not one in which I am personally interested, but I should like to ask that we take a half hour for the consideration of pension bills and bills to correct the records of soldiers.

Mr. STEWART. Right now?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I want to call up a little bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will yield.

Mr. STEWART. And will not yield to me?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; I am good-natured to everybody.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire? The Chair hears none.

NAVAJO COUNTY, ARIZ.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire to yield to me to call up a bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will yield if the bill does not cause discussion.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Of course. I ask unanimous consent to call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 7034) for the relief of Navajo County, Ariz.

Mr. KEAN. Is it a bond bill?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Let the bill be read for information subject to objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which will be read for information.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It authorizes the county of Navajo, Territory of Arizona, to refund its outstanding county indebtedness, evidenced by bonds of the county, Nos. 30 and 73, inclusive, payable to Apache County, Ariz.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FRANK C. DARLING.

Mr. NELSON. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire to yield to me for a moment to call up a bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will yield to the Senator from Minnesota if his bill does not result in discussion, and then I will ask that the pension bills be considered.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 586) for the relief of Frank C. Darling.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to pay $1,042 in full to Frank C. Darling, of Otter Tail County, Minn., for depredations committed on his property in 1862, by the Sioux Indians of Minnesota.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARTIN BOICE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first bill in order under the request of the Senator from New Hampshire will be stated.

The bill (H. R. 11812) granting an increase of pension to Martin Boice was announced as the first bill in order on the Calendar and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Martin Boice, late of Company D, Fifth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, and to pay him a pension of $24 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ALBERT H. STEIFENHOFER.

The bill (H. R. 2606) granting an increase of pension to Albert H. Steifenhofer was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Albert H. Steifenhofer, late of Company K, Third Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, and to pay him a pension of $24 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GEORGE W. MATHEWS.

The bill (H. R. 8924) granting an increase of pension to George W. Mathews was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of George W. Mathews, late of Company K, Seventeenth Regiment Iowa Volunteer Infantry, and to pay him a pension of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARY A. BAILEY.

The bill (H. R. 11495) granting a pension to Mary A. Bailey was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Mary A. Bailey, widow of Charles T. Bailey, late of Companies D and G, Thirty-fourth Regiment Michigan Volunteer Infantry, war with Spain, and to pay her a pension of $12 per month and $2 per month additional on account of each of the minor children of the said Charles T. Bailey until they reach the age of 16 years.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THOMAS L. CAUGHEY.

The bill (S. 1479) granting an increase of pension to Thomas L. Caughey was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Thomas L. Caughey, late of Company D, Thirty-eighth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $12 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN WASHBURN.

The bill (H. R. 3678) granting an increase of pension to John Washburn was considered as in Committee of the Whole. Gowdey, late of Company F, Second Regiment New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry, and to pay him a pension of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NELSON JOHNSON.

The bill (H. R. 11052) granting a pension to Nelson Johnson was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Nelson Johnson, late of Company A, Third Regiment New York Volunteer Light Artillery, and to pay him a pension of $12 per month, the same to be paid to him under the rules of the Pension Bureau as to mode and time of payment, without any deduction or rebate on account of former alleged overpayments or erroneous payments of pension.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LIZANA D. STREETER.

The bill (H. R. 2430) granting a pension to Lizana D. Streeter was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Lizana D. Streeter, widow of Buell G. Streeter, late surgeon Fourth Regiment New York Volunteer Cavalry, and to pay her a pension of $25 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARY A. MOORE.

The bill (S. 5045) granting an increase of pension to Mary A. Moore was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with amendments, in line 6, before the name "David," to strike out "the late;" in the same line, after the name "Moore," to insert "late;" and in line 9, before the word "dollars," strike out "fifty" and insert "forty;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary A. Moore, widow of David Moore, late colonel Twenty-first and Fifty-first regiments Missouri Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $40 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SYLVESTER S. VAN SICKEL.

The bill (S. 5049) for the relief of Sylvester Van Sickel was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes that the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to revoke the order dismissing from service Sylvester S. Van Sickel, late a captain of the Twelfth Missouri Cavalry Volunteers, and to issue him an honorable discharge as of the date of said order of dismissal: Provided, That said Van Sickel shall not be entitled to receive, under the terms of this act, any pay or other allowances to which he would be entitled if he had been honorably discharged at the date of said order of dismissal.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OCEANA B. IRWIN.

The bill (S. 4183) granting an increase of pension to Oceana B. Irwin was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with amendments, in line 6, after the word "of," where it occurs the second time, to strike out "Rear-Admiral," and in line 7, before the words "United States," to insert "late rear-admiral;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Oceana B. Irwin, widow of John Irwin, late rear-admiral, United States Navy, and pay her a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ABRAHAM SHREEVES.

The bill (S. 4374) granting an increase of pension to Abraham Shreeves was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 8, before the word "dollars," to strike out "thirty" and insert "twenty-four;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Abraham Shreeves, late of Company F, Fourteenth Regiment West Virginia Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $24 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FORREST E. ANDREWS.

The bill (H. R. 9496) granting a pension to Forrest E. Andrews was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Forrest E. Andrews, late of Battery I, Sixth Regiment United States Artillery, war with Spain.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EMILY BRIGGS.

The bill (H. R. 9592) granting a pension to Emily Briggs was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Emily Briggs, dependent mother of James Briggs, late of Company G, Forty-seventh Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, war with Spain, and to pay her a pension of $12 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN O'BRIEN.

The bill (H. R. 3442) to correct the record of John O'Brien was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments, in line 6, before the word "Sixth," to strike out "I" and insert "K," and in the same line, after the word "Infantry," to insert:

And substitute therefor the words "remained absent from his company without proper authority from March 3, 1863, to July 14, 1863, when he voluntarily returned and was duly enlisted, mustered, and assigned to Company I, in said regiment, and served faithfully and was honorably discharged."

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to remove the charge of desertion now standing on the records against John O'Brien, late private, Company K, Sixth Regiment United States Infantry, and substitute therefor the words "remained absent from his company without proper authority from March 3, 1863, to July 14, 1863, when he voluntarily returned and was duly enlisted, mustered, and assigned to Company I, in said regiment, and served faithfully and was honorably discharged:" Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall become due or payable by virtue of the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

REINHARD SCHNEIDER.

The bill (H. R. 9870) to correct the military record of Reinhard Schneider was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, in line 7, after the word "Schneider," to insert "as of the date of September 15, 1861;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to correct the military record of Rhinehart Schneider, late a private in the Seventy-ninth Regiment of New York Infantry Volunteers, and issue to him an honorable discharge from said regiment in the name of Reinhard Schneider as of the date of September 15, 1861: Provided, That no pay, bounty, or allowance shall become due or payable by reason of the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

ELI HIBBARD.

The bill (S. 5879) to remove the charge of desertion from the army record of Eli Hibbard was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, in line 8, after the word "service," to insert:

As of September 9, 1864: Provided, That no pay, bounty, or allowances shall accrue by virtue of this act.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to remove the charge of desertion now standing against the record of Eli Hibbard, late of One hundred and seventy-first Company, Second Battalion, Veteran Reserve Corps, war of the rebellion, and to issue to him an honorable discharge from the service as of September 9, 1864: Provided, That no pay, bounty, or allowances shall accrue by virtue of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CLARA E. DANIELS.

The bill (S. 5931) granting an increase of pension to Clara E. Daniels was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Clara E. Daniels, widow of David Daniels, late lieutenant, United States Navy, and pay her a pension at the rate of $35 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving, and $2 per month additional on account of the minor child of the said David Daniels until she reaches the age of 16 years.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 3110) to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans.

Mr. HANNA rose.

Mr. KEAN. If no one desires to take the floor upon the unfinished business, there is a pension bill which was reported this morning that I should like to have passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey asks the Senator from Ohio if he will yield to him that a pension bill may be passed.

Mr. HANNA. Yes; I will yield for half a dozen of them.

WILLIAM H. VAN RIPER.

Mr. KEAN. I ask for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 5984) granting an increase of pension to William H. Van Riper. The bill was reported favorably from the Committee on Pensions this morning.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of William H. Van Riper, late of Company G, Fifth Regiment New York Volunteer Heavy Artillery, and to pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. B. F. BARNES, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 4th instant approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. 2276) to fix the time of holding the circuit and district courts for the southern district of West Virginia;

An act (S. 2551) granting a pension to Amelia Engel;

An act (S. 4638) granting a pension to Helena Sudsburg;

An act (S. 3551) granting an increase of pension to John P. Collier;
An act (S. 3888) granting an increase of pension to Jesse H. Hubbard;
An act (S. 4240) granting an increase of pension to Calvin N. Perkins;
An act (S. 4415) granting an increase of pension to Vesta A. Brown;
An act (S. 4642) granting an increase of pension to Anne Dowery;
An act (S. 4655) granting an increase of pension to Oliver K. Wyman;
An act (S. 4760) granting an increase of pension to William Harrington;
An act (S. 4712) granting an increase of pension to Eliphlet Noyes;
An act (S. 4729) granting an increase of pension to Daniel A. Hall, alias William Knapp;
An act (S. 4730) granting an increase of pension to George W. Youngs;
An act (S. 4732) granting an increase of pension to Charles H. Hazzard;
An act (S. 4758) granting an increase of pension to Mary L. Doane;
An act (S. 4759) granting an increase of pension to Martha Clark;
An act (S. 4766) granting an increase of pension to James P. McClure;
An act (S. 4829) granting an increase of pension to Nimrod Headington;
An act (S. 4853) granting an increase of pension to Amos Moulton;
An act (S. 4862) granting an increase of pension to James Welch;
An act (S. 4871) granting an increase of pension to Helen M. Worthen;
An act (S. 5106) granting an increase of pension to Horace L. Richardson;
An act (S. 5152) granting an increase of pension to Marcellus M. M. Martin, alias Marion M. Martin;
An act (S. 5158) granting an increase of pension to Eri W. Pinkham;
An act (S. 5202) granting an increase of pension to Jennie M. Wagner;
An act (S. 5209) granting an increase of pension to Hannah A. Van Eaton;
An act (S. 5371) granting an increase of pension to Jonathan O. Thompson; and An act (S. 5759) granting an increase of pension to Charles T. Crooker.

The message also announced that the President of the United States had on the 5th instant approved and signed the following act and joint resolution:

An act (S. 3998) granting an increase of pension to Emma L. Kimble; and

A joint resolution (S. R. 91) providing for the publication of 50,000 copies of the Special Report of the Diseases of Cattle.

The message further announced that the President of the United States had on this day approved and signed the act (S. 2510) extending the time for the commencement and completion of the bridge across the Missouri River at or near Oacoma, S. Dak.

SCHOONERS E. R. NICKERSON AND WARY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report by the Secretary of State in regard to certain claims of British and German subjects growing out of the seizure of the British schooners E. R. Nickerson and Wary during the late war with Spain, which seizure was held by the prize court to be illegal and made without probable cause.

I recommend that an appropriation be made by Congress to pay the said claims in the amounts and to the persons named by the Secretary of State.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, June 6, 1902.

ISTHMIAN CANAL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3110) to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Allison,	Dolliver,	Jones, Ark.	Millard,
Bacon,	Dubois,	Kean,	Mitchell,
Bard,	Elkins,	Kearns,	Morgan,
Bate,	Fairbanks,	Kittredge,	Perkins,
Berry,	Foster, La.	McComas,	Scott,
Blackburn,	Foster, Wash.	McCumber,	Simon,
Burnham,	Frye,	McEnery,	Stewart,
Burrows,	Gallinger,	McLaurin, Miss.	Teller,
Burton,	Gamble,	McLaurin, S. C.	Warren.
Clay,	Hanna,	McMillan,
Cockrell,	Harris,	Mallory,
Cullom,	Heitfeld,	Mason,

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SIMON in the chair). Forty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The Senator from Ohio will proceed.

Mr. HANNA. Mr. President, before resuming the thread of my discourse where I left off yesterday, I wish to pay a passing notice to several things that were stated in his speech by the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL].

Unfortunately, I was absent from the Chamber when he made an allusion, commenting upon language that I had used, to the effect that I did not consider the Nicaragua route to be a feasible route for a canal, and he then quoted from the report of what he was pleased to term "HANNA'S Commission," contradicting my statement, such quotations being to the effect that the Nicaragua route is a feasible route for a canal.

I have the notes of my remarks, and the only thing that I find which could be tortured into such a meaning occurs in the language which I shall read. I said:

> You will find when this subject opens up that not only the questions of distance and curvature and locks enter into it, but that in regard to the Nicaragua route the trade winds blow every day in the year from 16 to 20 knots across the Nicaragua route. At the slow speed at which a vessel will be compelled to operate in passing through a narrow canal, these winds would make it an absolute physical impossibility to keep her off the banks without the aid of tugs.
> The more I have studied this question from the standpoint of the vessel, the more I have been convinced that we never have gone far enough in dealing with the successful operation of the canal, even when we had but the one route to consider.

Mr. President, I fail to see in that language any allusion to a fact or an inference that could be tortured into the statement which was put into my mouth by the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MITCHELL. If the Senator will allow me, I do not wish to misrepresent the Senator, and if he states now, as I understand him to state, that he thinks the Nicaragua route is feasible, it is all right.

Mr. HANNA. I stand by my statement as I made it yesterday. I have nothing to take back and nothing to change in the language I used.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is made a little stronger now.

Mr. HANNA. What I have read is copied exactly from the official record.

Mr. MITCHELL. But I say the Senator is now making it a little stronger, as I understand him, in the way of indorsing the Nicaragua route as a feasible route.

Mr. HANNA. Well, I will make my own argument and use my own language in making it.

There is nothing so important in the language stated by the Senator from Oregon, but I do take exception to the insinuation coupled with it that it was "HANNA'S Commission." As a member of the United States Senate I consider that I am here to do my duty to the country, and when I am honored by being placed upon an important committee to whose charge is committed a responsibility like the Isthmian Canal I enter upon those duties with the consciousness of that responsibility upon me, determined to do all in my power to discharge the duties faithfully and conscientiously.

Mr. President, everyone knows how that Commission was appointed and the purpose for which it was appointed.

Through all the years of discussion upon this important question, during which time three separate surveys had been made under the orders of the United States Government, information and facts had been piled up in reports furnished to everybody seeking the knowledge of facts available for that purpose. Yet in the progress of our development (as I cited yesterday) the great question of transportation had grown to be so enormous and so important that in the mind of almost every legislator in this Congress there seemed to be an honest doubt, acting for future generations, as to whether we had yet arrived at a proposition which was right and one which would be satisfactory to the country. There was an honest doubt, I say. Then came the resolution of Congress passed by both Houses March 3, 1899, authorizing and instructing the President of the United States to appoint a commission to examine all the routes upon the Isthmus and report to the President their findings as to which would be the most desirable upon which to construct a canal.

Does any Senator question that President McKinley failed in his appreciation of the responsibilities put upon him by that resolution?

Will anyone question what would be his desire and his purpose in selecting to act upon that important Commission not only the most available but the best equipped engineers that could be found in the United States?

Where did he go? To the Army, to the Navy, selecting men who were a part of this Government; honorable men, able men, men who could be trusted in an official act to the fullest extent. He associated with them a choice from the whole country, selecting from civil life the most distinguished engineers.

The President took ample time and made careful search to find those men. Will anybody reading that list of names offer any criticism as to their motives and their integrity in serving their country and their Government?

"HANNA'S Commission," indeed! Why, Mr. President, in discussing this proposition, important as it is to the country, I seek to discuss it upon a higher level than that; and if the appeal I make to this body does not carry with it the conviction that the route for which I stand is the best for the United States, then I should not personally desire to have it adopted. I said yesterday that there was no politics in this proposition, no sentiment in it, no sectionalism in it, and certainly there is no personality in it.

The Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL], in his discussion of this question, made an elaborate argument, which was interesting and showed research, with reference to the coal trade. I could not exactly see how the coal trade was going to be affected in the immediate future by this canal, but I noted in one statement, to which I wish to refer, that one of the things which would prevent the growth and development of that coal trade between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans would be the fact that, as to a vessel operating through the Tropics, her cargo would be in danger from spontaneous combustion—a new proposition to me. I have had thirty years' experience in handling bituminous coal, but I never heard of spontaneous combustion arising from the fact of the heat of the zones when the coal was under cover and protected from moisture. The only destruction of which I have ever known personally grew out of the fact that owing to impurities of the coal, which contained an abnormal amount of sulphur, in large piles, on the very northern shores of Lake Superior, in the winter time, it has taken fire from spontaneous combustion.

The Senator from Oregon referred to the distribution of coal for fuel between the Atlantic and the Pacific and its connection with the transportation of east-bound commodities, and I believe the Senator quoted the wheat export from the Pacific coast to Liverpool and to other parts of Europe. Mr. President, it is a well-known fact that, although wheat may be carried in sailing vessels or in tramp steamers to Liverpool or to any other European port, a return cargo, which is carried in the way of ballast, must be loaded upon that vessel where she is discharged. No tramp steamer or sailing ship after transporting a cargo of wheat from San Francisco or Portland to Liverpool would return to the United States to load a cargo of coal at ballast rates for San Francisco or for any other Pacific port south. If they were going to take a cargo of coal from any place to the Pacific coast, they would take it from England, where coal is cheaper than it is in the United States and where they would sail from.

The elaborate argument of the Senator, made with reference to the consumption of coal in Europe and as to European countries looking to this for their future supply, is correct, and I am glad of it. But tell me how the business of the isthmian canal would affect the loading of coal from any port on the Gulf or Norfolk or Baltimore for any port in Germany or Belgium or France or Russia or any ship carrying grain from the Pacific coast to the Orient?

No, Mr. President, these questions of transportation, which concern the usefulness of this canal, are governed by trade relations and rules as important and as infallible as the laws of nature. The time will come when we shall export coal from those ports to South America on the Pacific coast and to South America on the Atlantic coast; and that time is not far distant. Fortunately for us, we have the greatest reservoirs of bituminous coal in this country which are to be found in the world, which are undeveloped. They are to be found on the Big Sandy.

Another question comes up, which was raised by the Senator from Oregon, and he made a statement, which I question, with reference to Professor Haupt, reading from his testimony before the Committee on Interoceanic Canals. He spoke of what "we" had done on the Isthmus. I happened to remember asking Professor Haupt the question whether he was with the Commission on the Isthmus. He replied, No, he was not; that he had been on the Isthmus; that he had been connected with one of the earlier surveys, either with Ludlow or Menocal, along the Nicaragua route, several years ago; that he had been across the Isthmus of Panama, but never to make an examination in detail as to the physical conditions or the engineering features on that route.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Ohio permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. HANNA. With pleasure.

Mr. HARRIS. With the permission of the Senator from Ohio, I wish to read exactly what Professor Haupt said:

> Mr. HAUPT. Yes, answering the question of Senator HARRIS as to my qualifications, I would say that I have served on both of those Commissions and have been over both of the routes critically, have assisted in the preparation of estimates and reports, and feel that I am reasonably competent to give an opinion.
> The CHAIRMAN. By both routes do you mean both the Nicaragua and the Panama routes?
> Mr. HAUPT. Yes.

Mr. Haupt was not with the last Commission at the time it went over the Panama Canal route.

Mr. HANNA. That is what I said. He never went to the Isthmus in connection with his duties in this last Isthmian Canal Commission. Not only that, but the first step taken by that Commission, after their appointment and confirmation, was to go to Paris to examine there the details, the drawings, the notes, and everything in the possession of the New Panama Canal Company which would aid them in their investigation and research.

Mr. Haupt did not go with that Commission. Of the number who did go, three of those engineers were men who had always been, and were then, absolutely favorable to the Nicaragua route as the route for the canal across the Isthmus.

There were assembled there at that meeting, to meet these gentlemen from this country, nearly all the eminent foreign engineers of whom I spoke yesterday, and who had been called in to counsel and advise the New Panama Company before it decided to go ahead and expend that $13,000,000. On the invitation of the new company, the engineer of the Manchester Canal, from England; the engineer of the Kiel Canal, from Germany, and the engineers from Russia and from Holland, and five or six of the most eminent engineers in France, were called to meet the American Commission and placed themselves at the disposal of our Commission, with all the information that was obtainable through the years of research and surveys made in the early history of the canal construction. What they found there they will tell you in their full report; but they were so impressed by the thoroughness which thus far had governed and guided the men who had put their money into this enterprise that they offered to purchase the maps and notes; but instead duplicates of them were presented to our Commission. On their return to the United States they formed their organization for thorough investigation on the Isthmus, dividing the duties into detail, assigning the engineers who had been on two of the surveys of the Nicaragua route to the Panama route, and two of the others, to whom the Nicaragua route was a newer proposition, were sent to Nicaragua.

Weeks and months were spent by them in those investigations and with a perfect army of experts.

As a result, they found that the facts and statements and maps presented to them by the Panama Canal Company in Paris were absolutely correct, and the policy upon which they had then entered, of constructing a lock canal, was approved.

Later on you will hear a great deal about the Bohio dam, the great bugbear that has been raised against the physical conditions and possibilities of the construction of the Panama Canal. When the project for a sea-level canal was abandoned and the project taken up by the new company, in view of the fact that up to that time millions of money had been wasted and the company was in an embarrassed financial condition, they sought to ascertain the fact whether a cheaper canal (a canal governed by locks) could be built, and for what sum. It was that question that this talented assemblage of engineers had worked out before our Commission approached the subject, and it was upon their recommendations that the new company had acted and thousands of men were put to work. Upon the policy outlined by the new company, under the advice of these engineers, our Commission agreed on all matters except that of the Bohio dam. The maps are here, and they plainly and clearly display the Bohio dam and the other dam on the Nicaragua route.

But a question as to the foundation has arisen. It was to be a large dam. That dam was to hold in check the waters of the Chagres, and to create a lake 9 miles long, which was to be a part of the navigation of the canal, and of course a very important work. The statement was made yesterday that the French engineers knew nothing about the foundation below stratum of clay. I am told that is not the fact; that they knew all about how much below the clay the bed of rock was; but, exercising all the experience and intelligence that they had gained in a lifetime spent in their profession, they came to the conclusion that for the necessities of that particular dam it was not necessary to go below the stratum of clay for a foundation, and upon those lines they were proceeding.

Our Commission made their borings there, as they did everywhere else, having the report of the French engineers before them, and being doubly careful considering the importance of their duties, they said that dam could be built upon the bed of clay and probably be perfectly safe; but as a factor of safety beyond that they proposed, if it were found necessary, to sink caissons through the clay to the rock, and that would be an antidote of prevention of any possible damage that might come to the foundation of the dam through seepage.

Mr. Morison, perhaps the highest authority in the United States upon the question of deep foundations, differed from his colleagues to the extent that he said that the French plan was all right, and if he was put in a position to assume the entire responsibility he would unhesitatingly commence the foundation of that dam upon that bed of clay, and he did not consider that he would be risking anything in that undertaking.

The statement was also made yesterday that the feat of sinking these caissons to that depth was an untried and unheard-of piece of engineering and was therefore risky. Why, Mr. President, there are now done a great many things which fifty years ago were unheard of, never dreamed of, never thought possible, as a product of human intelligence and ingenuity in engineering. It has become almost a by-word to-day that in the hands of a skillful engineer nothing is impossible; and there is no doubt of the fact that caissons can be put 15 or 16 feet deeper than there has ever yet been a call for them to be placed.

Mr. Morison says that he has put down the deepest one that was ever put down, in the construction of the bridges across the Mississippi and the Missouri rivers, at St. Louis and Memphis and at other points. He says that were it necessary to go to the additional depth, it could be done, and he told us how. All you have got to do to get to that depth below the water level is to pump the water down so many feet lower than its head.

I asked the question of one of the engineers—I think it was Professor Haupt—as to whether the ground could not be frozen through that clay so as to sink the caissons, and he said he had never heard of such a thing. I can tell him of a shaft that was sunk 300 feet in a mine in Lake Superior.

Therefore, when we are talking about technique and the possibilities of what may be accomplished in the way of engineering, let us at least consider as the best authorities upon these questions the men who have devoted their lives and abilities to that profession.

In all the discussion of this question I am keeping steadily before me the fact that when the United States Congress passed a resolution directing the President to send out this Commission to ascertain for our information which was the best route upon which to construct a canal across the Isthmus, that was done because we needed some advice upon these questions, and that advice we have here, signed in the first instance by every member of the Commission. One of these gentlemen I have named, however, and who seems to be a star witness on this question, says that he signed under protest. I am not a lawyer, but I am told that when a man gives evidence and then goes before a court under oath and takes it back it is a question whether such evidence is admissible on either side.

On the question of witnesses I want to say one word more. A gentleman has been quoted here with reference to the physical and other conditions about the route across Nicaragua—a Captain Merry, who is the United States minister to Nicaragua and to two or three other countries in South America; an officer of the Government who writes letters, which are produced here as testimony, showing why the Nicaragua route is the best for a canal. Naturally, consideration should be given to such testimony, because he is a resident there, and is supposed to represent his Government for its best interests. Does he?

Mr. President, Captain Merry is a stockholder in the Maritime Canal Company, which stands knocking at the doors of this Government, asking our intercession and aid in enforcing its claims against Nicaragua and Costa Rica for nonfulfillment of an agreement. On one side the claim is made that the concessions to that company are forfeited, and on the other it is denied; but that raises a question that can only be settled by law, a question which, injected into this canal controversy, may give us lots of trouble. This gentleman who is extolling the merits of the Nicaragua route is a stockholder in the Maritime Canal Company, and would be an interested party if through the agency of the adoption of the Nicaragua route any benefit should come to the Maritime Canal Company.

I think he had better attend to the proper duties to which he is assigned and accredited.

Again, Mr. Menocal, an engineer long ago identified with the enterprise of the Nicaragua Canal, was the one who conducted, I think, the second survey after the Childs survey across that portion of the Isthmus. He organized the Maritime Canal Company and induced capitalists to invest in it as a private enterprise for construction of a canal along his proposed route.

He, too, is a stockholder and also, I believe, is a director in the company. His testimony is offered as an engineer from a technical standpoint to prove to this Senate that that is a better route than the other. A disinterested witness, surely!

Now, in the consideration of this question, I want to call attention to another fact. Reference has been made here to the fact that the House has already passed the bill known as the Hepburn bill, which was offered, I think, on the second day after the Senate met and placed upon the Calendar. That bill had passed the House (January 9, 1902) a week before this supplementary report was made (January 18, 1902) and passed the House within a few weeks after the first report was made by this Commission (November 16, 1901); and that report was hurried, demand being made on the Commissioners that it must be speedily furnished; and they say that it was a very unsatisfactory report to them as to details.

Ordinarily men of business and of affairs, in going into a venture involving the expenditure of $200,000,000, would go very slowly and would be very certain of knowing just what they were doing.

When the Hepburn bill passed the House of Representatives, I do not believe there were twenty-five men in that body who had ever read that report, brief as it was, and scores of them have told me since that they knew nothing about it, except that they were voting for what they supposed to be a canal. They wanted the Nicaragua Canal, because it had grown into the sentiment of the people. One week after that bill passed, the offer of the Panama Canal Company, agreeing to accept the price which we had put upon their property, $40,000,000, was submitted to Congress by the President with the supplemental report of the Commission.

Mr. President, that brought into this question an entirely new factor, a feature that never was considered for one moment in the debate in the House. But through the discussion in the newspapers and the gossip in the corridors members of that body come to know something about it and that something new was coming; and in order to have the opportunity to avail themselves of a full knowledge of the situation, in order that we might make no mistake, knowing that we could trust the President of the United States and his advisers upon a question of such importance, an amendment was offered by Mr. MORRIS, of Minnesota, providing that the whole matter be referred to the President with power to act, and within forty-eight hours before the final vote was taken in the House that amendment gained the confidence of a hundred and ten members of that body. I am not saying that the measure was rushed or railroaded through the House for a purpose. I know that all in both Houses felt anxious during this session of Congress to bring to a satisfactory conclusion the great canal question.

In view of the fact that these additional factors were not acted upon at the other end of the Capitol, the Senate thought it wise to pursue still further investigations, and a resolution was adopted authorizing the Committee on Interoceanic Canals to call before it the members of the Commission and examine them in detail upon this new proposition. For weeks, several times every week, our committee held meetings. Nearly every member of the Commission appeared before the committee, was examined and cross-examined, and a full report of those examinations is available to every Senator. It is in print as a Senate document, and if I or any other advocate of either canal fails to make a proposition understood, the opportunity is before you to acquire the information.

I am anxious that every man before he votes upon this question shall decide it for himself in view of all the conditions and environments, because the country expects us collectively and individually to do the best thing for its interests

I now read from the views of the minority as to advantages of the Panama route over the Nicaragua route:

The advantages stated by the Commission concerning the Panama Canal are:

1. It is 134.57 miles shorter than the Nicaragua from sea to sea (being 49.09 miles by Panama as against 183.66 miles by Nicaragua).

2. It has less curvature, both in degrees and miles, being but 22.85 miles of curvature as against 49.29 on the Nicaragua, and but 771 degrees for Panama as against 2,339 degrees for Nicaragua.

3. The actual time of transit is less, being but twelve hours of steaming by Panama, as against a minimum of thirty-three hours of steaming by Nicaragua; that is, of one day of daylight as against three days of daylight (for the canal must be navigated by day exclusively at first, and, to a great extent, always, especially by large ships, which chiefly will use it. The Commission's plan does not provide facilities for navigation by night).

4. The locks are fewer in number, being but five on the Panama to eight on the Nicaragua.

5. The harbors are better, those at the termini of the Panama being good and already used by the commerce of the world, while at the termini of the Nicaragua there are no harbors whatever.

Mr. President, I pause here to say that in the estimates made by the engineers as to the total cost of each route the question of the construction of the harbors at both places has been considered and provided for. The harbor at Greytown, which was once a good harbor, has filled up, and a part of the enormous expense which is estimated by the engineers for the operation and maintenance of the canal is for the purpose of keeping that harbor open. That is one large feature.

6. The Panama route traverses a beaten track in civilization, having been in use by the commerce of the world for four centuries, while the Nicaragua route passes through an unsettled and undeveloped wilderness.

The argument has been made that that is to the advantage of the Nicaragua route from the standpoint of health. During the construction of the Panama Railroad, and later during the progress of the work on the Panama Canal, it was unhealthful, and there are those who can explain why better than I can; but when you attempt to dig a ditch through the morasses and untouched earth along the Nicaragua route, where decayed vegetation for centuries has formed a delta, is it not fair to suppose that the same conditions will arise there as did arise when the ditch was being dug for the Panama Canal?

Another important adjunct to the early completion of the Panama Canal is the fact—

7. There already exists on the Panama route a railroad perfect in every respect and equipped in a modern manner, closely following the line of the canal, and thus greatly facilitating the construction of the canal, as well as furnishing a source of revenue, and included in the offer of the Panama company.

8. The annual cost of maintenance and operation of the Panama Canal would be $1,300,000 less than that of the Nicaragua (which sum capitalized is the equivalent of $65,000,000).

9. All engineering and practical questions involved in the construction of the Panama are satisfactorily settled and assured, all the physical conditions are known and the estimates of the cost reliable, while the Nicaragua involves unknown and uncertain factors in construction and unknown difficulties to be encountered, which greatly increase the risks of construction and render uncertain the maximum cost of completion.

And that to me is a very important factor. I know from personal information from individual members of the Commission that it is with them a very important factor as to the cost. But in estimating the cost of the construction of the canal they have taken the same unit of value and used it in both instances. As a practical question to-day there has been sufficient work done along the entire line of the Panama route to enable skillful engineers to figure as close as it is possible to figure upon anything in the future. In short, there has been a development which shows all the conditions of soil, of rock, of streams, of cuts, and of curves. Every physical condition that can possibly arise there is exposed like an open book, to be studied from the surface. Taking that unit of value, the engineers made their estimates upon the Panama Canal and applied them to the Nicaragua Canal, to be perfectly fair. But there is no living man who can say what will be encountered when the work begins through the miles of swamp and morass, with the many difficulties which we are always liable to meet in countries like that; and the engineers only speak of possibilities when questioned. They hope to be able to construct the Nicaragua Canal within the limits of their estimates, figuring in both cases upon the same per cent of safety.

The question of earthquakes and volcanoes, which seems to be a burning question just now, is discussed in the Commission's report, but not at length. They came to the conclusion that it was about an even thing between the two routes as to the possibilities of danger from earthquakes. You can go back a half century—and I do not know but that you can go back more than that—and cite the terrible earthquake that took place at Panama; and later on you can cite, as I will myself, the more recent earthquake. But none of them, to my mind, has been of sufficient force to destroy a canal. They might damage it. But the basis of the canal is in the earth. It is a ditch. It is a structure of masonry, having a deep foundation. It is not a high building. So, while earthquakes are frequent, I do not think there is enough in the question of earthquakes to deter us from building a canal along either route.

But there is another question which has been forced upon our attention in this connection by the most awful calamity that has come to us in recent years. I refer to volcanoes.

Looking upon that map, which is a Government map, from the point of those active volcanoes southwest of Greytown, clear up through Nicaragua, are a number of volcanoes which have been in operation in recent years. I do not propose to devote very much time to the question, but I do wish to read from Professor Heilprin, who is now at Martinique. In discussing the question of volcanoes in a report published by him in March, 1902, he says:

We are told that a glance at the map appended to the report will show "that the entire Isthmus between North and South America is a volcanic region," and, following Humboldt, that "the grandest example of a continental volcanic chain is offered by the rampart of the Andes extending from the southern part of Chile to the northwest of America" (p. 168). It has, however, been known for a full quarter of a century that the main Andes do not traverse the Isthmus of Panama, and that there are no active or recently decayed volcanoes in any part of the true Isthmus. So far, therefore, as danger from direct volcanic contacts is concerned the Panama route is exempt. The case is very different with the Nicaragua route, whose line is laid across the almost continuously volcanic tract that binds Costa Rica with Salvador, and which has been, during the period of the last three-quarters of a century, probably the most violently eruptive of any in the Western Hemisphere. On the line of crustal weakness that is occupied by Lakes Nicaragua and Managua there are distributed over a linear distance of little more than 200 miles not less than twenty-five volcanoes, most of which have been active within a very modern period of time, while a number are still active to-day. A few actually lie within the basin of Lake Nicaragua itself. Coseguina, which lies only 60 miles distant from the line of the initially proposed canal, went through a paroxysm in 1835 which has been described by the geologist of the Nicaragua Canal Commission as "the most violent recorded eruption until surpassed by that of Krakatoa in 1883."

Mr. MITCHELL. From what is the Senator from Ohio reading?

Mr. HANNA. I am reading from an article by Prof. Angelo Heilprin, F. R. G. S., vice-president of the Geographical Society of Philadelphia, member of the American Philosophical Society, of the board of managers of the National Geographic Society of Washington, of the Geological Society of America, etc., and an expert on volcanoes and earthquakes.

A statement was made here the other day that very recently, within a few days, an earthquake had taken place very near to Nicaragua, and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] took the pains to have the minister from Nicaragua cable to his President to ascertain the facts with reference to it. I have here clippings from a paper in Honduras and from several other papers, copied from native papers, as to this earthquake and its results. The first information was brought by passengers on a steamer which landed at New Orleans, and the facts as given were quoted by the press of this country. Subsequent information came more direct by cable until it became a news item. Overshadowed by the Martinique disaster, people paid but little attention to this. But in the discussion of this question, when the denial has been made that any such occurrence took place, I claim your indulgence to read a few lines from this article.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. What is the date of it?

Mr. HANNA. April 25.

From El Diario de Honduras, dated April 25, we take the following important news:

The latest papers of Nicaragua bring us bad news. La Democracia, of Managua, of March 24, says:

"In consequence of the earthquake which occurred to-day at five minutes to 2 the greater part of the wharf at Momotombo went to the bottom, all the freight which was there, among which was a large quantity of bags of coffee, being lost. The small engine which performs the local service of the wharf also fell into the water. The Government has ordered a body of workmen to be organized for the purpose of trying to get out the coffee, and there will be added a commission of mechanical engineers to repair the damage sustained. The shock was very strong in Chinandega, Leon, and other places in the west. There was no other injury."

On the following day the same paper published the following item:

"From Leon we are informed by telegraph that the shock of last night was felt with much force in that city. Buildings were so shaken that their falling to the ground was thought imminent. The bells of all the churches rang at the moment of the disturbance. Referring to the shock at midday yesterday, one of the passengers who arrived in one of the lake steamers relates that at the same hour he could observe that an immense column of smoke and fire shot up from Momotombo, by which it is with reason believed that the shocks which were felt yesterday in this place came from that volcano."

One of the correspondents in Leon of the paper mentioned writes under date of March 26:

"Persons who have just come from the country report that the shocks which have caused so much alarm come from the volcano of Asosoca, which has been pouring out torrents of lava. Furthermore, in the neighboring farms there has been some destruction, the house on one of them having been leveled to the ground."

The correspondent in Momotombo of El Iris de la Tarde, of Granada, communicates to that paper the following: "The shock which has just been felt here was very great and caused much havoc. Part of the wharf sank, carrying down into the water a great quantity of bags of coffee. The roofs of various houses fell to the ground, causing great panic among the population, but there is no loss of life to lament. The little locomotive La Paz also fell into the water, injuring itself not a little. The people are much alarmed, and the authorities of the port have employed all their activity in taking the necessary precautions. It is thought that these shocks, seeds of destruction and misery, will continue, since the proximity of the volcanoes is the cause of our witnessing such terrible scenes." (From La Republica, Guatemala, May 13, 1902.)

Mr. President, the terrible calamity at Martinique has awakened the scientific world to renewed investigation and study, and the man whom I have just quoted (Professor Heilprin) at the risk of his life stood upon the brink of the crater of Mount Pelee only the other day. The sense of the people has been quickened to the horrors which may come, no one can tell when or where. But we should consider that at Nicaragua we are invading the territory of the volcano; and while, as I said before, we may not be terrified to the extent that we will withhold our support from a canal on account of the earthquakes, when it is a fact beyond dispute that within Lake Nicaragua itself are two volcanoes, one of which has been recently active, and when we measure the destructive capacity of a volcano by the horror at Martinique, where the earth was opened and swallowed up a lake and enough lava and ashes poured down the sides of the volcano to fill up a lake like Nicaragua, is it reasonable, is it safe to put aside lightly such conditions?

We are not going back into history to find precedents. We are not speculating as we do sometimes with earthquakes, which may occur anywhere in this country, but we are confronted with the fact that periodically in that country there has occurred a condition caused by volcanic influences which no man can foretell, but may merely speculate about. If there were no other causes, every other thing being equal, would not any party or corporation in entering upon an investment of $200,000,000 pause at least and consider the seismic and volcanic conditions?

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SIMON in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. HANNA. Yes.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Ohio be kind enough to state what, in his opinion, is the range of danger of a volcano? He says he is not afraid of the shaking of the earth, the earthquake effect of the action, but that it is the pouring out of lava, and, I suppose, the shower of cinders, etc., that he dreads. I will be glad if he will tell us, as he has probably looked up the matter, at what distance from an ordinary or any volcano a man would be in danger?

Mr. HANNA. I think the Senator from Kansas is rather disposed to jump at conclusions about what I said. He says I am not afraid of earthquakes. I would get out of the way of one if I could.

Mr. HARRIS. To be correct, I understood the Senator to say that that would be, so far as either route is concerned——

Mr. HANNA. I said I did not believe there was enough difference in the conditions with respect to the possibilities or probabilities of an earthquake upon the Isthmus as between the two routes to draw any distinction.

Mr. HARRIS. Then I suppose you dismiss the earthquake danger?

Mr. HANNA. I do not do anything of the kind. If you will allow me, Mr. Senator, I will use my own words. I am perfectly willing to be interrupted and to be asked a question, but I do not propose to have any Senator put a meaning upon the words I use, and I do not intend to take up my time offering explanations.

Mr. HARRIS. The question which I asked the Senator and which I would be glad to have him answer is, What is the range of danger of a volcano?

Mr. HANNA. I have never been as close to one as has the Senator from Kansas. He has said that he once looked into a crater.

Mr. HARRIS. Yes, that is true.

Mr. HANNA. I would not have done it. I am that much afraid of them.

Mr. HARRIS. I beg to say that that is not an answer to my question.

Mr. HANNA. I beg to state that if the volcano in Lake Nicaragua should play the same part that Mount Pelee has done, and yield up such a torrent of ashes and lava, and open crevices in the earth, creating an avenue through which the waters of Lake Nicaragua could filter, with the horrible adjunct of steam, it would force enough cinders and lava from the bowels of the earth to fill up the basin of Lake Nicaragua.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator pardon me if I suggest that the whole island of Martinique would not fill one-half of Lake Nicaragua?

Mr. HANNA. The Senator can make that statement in his own speech. I do not know anything about it.

Now, we come to the question of the utility of the canal.

Admitting, if you please, for the sake of the argument, that the physical and engineering difficulties in the construction of the canal are the same on each route, and supposing the canal to have been built and completed according to contract and to the satisfaction of the Government, we come to the question, for what purpose was the canal built?

Shall it merely be a monument of engineering skill? Shall it be said that it was built merely because the people of the United States wanted to show what they could do—what France had not accomplished? Or is it a patriotic, broad question of building a practicable canal which shall benefit the whole world and its commerce for all time to come?

Looking upon that side of this proposition as the real fruit of the enterprise, let us study the relative conditions and advantages of these two routes, and upon that basis I want to discuss this question.

The statement was made yesterday by the Senator from Oregon that the difference in the distance between certain points (I believe he did not mention them) is altogether in favor of the Nicaragua route. Now, what are the facts?

New York may be taken as the representative of all North American Atlantic ports; the course from all these ports to either Colon or Greytown would be around Cape Maysi, the eastern end of Cuba.

New Orleans may be taken as the representative Gulf port, the course from there to either Panama or Greytown being through the Yucatan Channel.

I am reading now from the testimony of Mr. Morison, one of the engineers on the Commission.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. From what page are you reading?

Mr. HANNA. Page 597. It is in the full report of the hearings before the committee.

The distances from these several ports to Colon and Greytown are as follows:

Port.	To—		Difference in favor of Colon.
	Colon.	Greytown.
	Miles.	Miles.	Miles.
New York	1,965	2,025	60
New Orleans	1,400	1,260	—140
Plymouth	4,495	4,665	170
Average			30

From the objective point in the English Channel, taking that as the central point from which to figure for your vessels which are to carry coal as back loading to the Pacific coast, it is 170 miles nearer to Colon than Greytown. It is a shorter distance, as vessels must navigate from that English port to the port of Colon, the harbor of the Panama Canal, by 170 miles than it is to the Nicaragua Canal.

The distance from New York is calculated from Sandy Hook. Gibraltar, which would represent all Mediterranean ports, is 222 miles nearer St. Thomas than Plymouth is, but the difference will be constant.

The time required to pass through the Panama Canal is approximately equal to the time required for a steamer to travel 150 miles at sea. The time required to pass through the Nicaragua Canal is approximately equal to the time required for a steamer to travel 400 miles at sea. These distances correspond to a speed of 12 miles an hour at sea; they represent an advantage of 250 miles in favor of Panama; with a speed of 10 miles per hour this difference would be reduced to 208 miles; with a speed of 15 miles per hour it would be increased to 312 miles; to avoid unnecessary complications they are considered a fair mean for all conditions. If we add these distances to those given above we have the practical distances from the three representative ports to the Pacific termini of the two canals, as follows:

Port.	To—		Difference in favor of Panama.
	Panama.	Brito.
	Miles.	Miles.	Miles.
New York	2,115	2,424	310
New Orleans	1,550	1,660	110
Plymouth	4,645	5,065	420
Average			280

In general it may be said that it will take about a day longer in the average of all voyages for steamers to reach the western terminus of the Nicaragua Canal than to reach the western terminus of the Panama Canal.

On the Pacific there will be three classes of traffic—that going to San Francisco and all Northern Pacific ports, including those of Asia; that going to South American ports; that going to South Pacific ports, as in New Zealand and Australia.

Yokohama may be considered the first port that will be made by steamers going to either Japan or China. In order to make a coaling point voyages would be made either by way of San Francisco or of Honolulu. Of these routes that by way of San Francisco is 1,500 miles the shorter. For these reasons the port of San Francisco may be considered as representing not only California traffic, but all traffic for China and Japan.

Manila, which may be taken as the representative port of the Philippines, is 200 miles farther from Brito by way of Honolulu than by way of San Francisco, and 186 miles farther from Panama by way of Honolulu than by way of San Francisco. The relative difference is really very slight, and the two routes may be considered as practically of equal length.

San Francisco is 3,179 miles from Panama and 2,636 miles from Brito, a difference of 543 miles in favor of Brito.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him at that point?

Mr. HANNA. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am not quite certain the Senator understood my statement yesterday, or the point I desired to make.

What I said, or at least what I intended to say, was to take San Francisco as one point on our western coast and New York and New Orleans on the other side, and taking the port of Liverpool, I contrasted the difference in the routes going by the usual way of travel, outside of the bearings between these routes across the Isthmus.

I said, or ought to have said, if I did not, that the distance from San Francisco to New York by way of the Nicaragua route is 377 miles shorter than is the distance from the city of San Francisco to New York by the way of the Panama route, and, further, that the distance from San Francisco to New Orleans by the Nicaragua route, going by the usual way of travel, is 579 miles shorter than is the distance between San Francisco and New Orleans by the Panama route. Further, I said, or intended to say, that the distance between San Francisco and Liverpool, England, by way of the Nicaragua route is 386 miles shorter than is the distance from San Francisco to Liverpool by way of the Panama route.

Mr. HANNA. I do not dispute the figures the Senator gives. I do not know where he got them.

Mr. MITCHELL. They are authentic.

Mr. HANNA. I have taken different points. I have taken Plymouth instead of Liverpool. The distance given here from San Francisco to New York by the way of Panama is 5,294 miles and by way of Nicaragua 5,061 miles. The distance from New Orleans is 4,729 miles by Panama and 4,296 miles by Nicaragua.

Mr. MITCHELL. But if the Senator will allow me——

Mr. HANNA. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL. Does not the Senator from Ohio see that while taking the point in the Philippines, for instance, or in China or Japan, while it may be true that the distance is much longer from ports in those countries to Brito than to Panama, yet it makes no difference when you take into consideration the whole route, and there will be precisely the same difference in the length of the route, taking as a starting point a port in China and Japan or the Philippine Islands and going to New York, New Orleans, and Liverpool, that there would be in going from San Francisco to New York, New Orleans, and Liverpool?

Mr. HANNA. Mr. President, these figures are no doubt correct, or approximately so, in both cases. There is not so much difference, but this is simply a measurement of miles of distance.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator's figures are all right, but he misapplies them.

Mr. HANNA. When you take into account that it takes three times as long to pass through the Nicaragua Canal as it takes to pass through the Panama Canal, figuring 150 miles for a day's run at sea, you reduce all these distances to an insignificant amount, the delays aside; but from the estimates made in passing through the canal, and that is the basis, taking the liability to accident and unusual delay, then the comparison comes, multiplied by the distance, plus the number of curvatures, plus the trade winds which exist in one place and not in the other, and plus every contingency that is liable under the conditions to occur in the navigation of the Nicaragua Canal.

Now, Mr. President, I only speak of this matter of transportation and distances for the purpose of leading up to another fact. Starting, for the sake of argument, upon the hypothesis of equality, if you please, as to the time it will take a steamer from London or Liverpool or Plymouth to reach any point on the Pacific coast or in the Orient, I ask the privilege of submitting some testimony with reference to the other conditions.

The Senator from Oregon yesterday—and I allude briefly to it because it now comes to my mind—made reference to the dangers on the coast at Colon, and the harbor of Colon. Mr. President, the harbor at Colon has been a harbor for nearly fifty years. It must be kept a harbor because it is the eastern terminus of the Panama Railroad. The hydrographic work of the Government, published for the information and the benefit of those who have to navigate ships, states just what the conditions are all along that coast.

The harbor at Greytown is no longer a harbor, but it can be made one. It is only a question of dollars and cents. As to the prevalence of bad weather, as to the liability of that great scourge on that coast, the northers, which come only occasionally, sometimes without warning and nearly always destructive, every master of a vessel who navigates those waters has his text-book before him published by this Government, which tells him of the conditions which will surround him there, and if he is caught napping with a norther, it is his own fault. Those dangers are simply those incident to navigation at ports all over this world. When you undertake to say that Colon is more liable to such incidents than Greytown, it is a mistake.

With reference to the coast of Nicaragua and Costa Rico I quote from the United States Hydrographic Report:

> During the period from March to June, within a few miles of the shore, land and sea breezes alternate, but the former generally preponderates and comes off from the southwest and west, not directly from the land; so, in like manner, the sea breeze blows slantingly in from the eastward, and they both frequently rush down in a sudden gust which should be well prepared for. In the later months of the year fresh westerly winds prevail, called by the old Spanish mariners "vendavales," and between November and February northers will occasionally reach thus far, but their force is considerably moderated after passing to the southward of the islands.
> Hurricanes do not appear to visit this coast, although the northeastern part of it certainly lies within the verge of their limits—

That is Greytown—

> but destructive gales happen in the rainy season, which destroy the crops, even at the adjacent islands. It is also subjected at this period to most violent tornadoes, to which no sail can be shown, but they do not last long and are generally preceded by faint sheet lightning on the eastern horizon, which will give sufficient warning to seek shelter when sailing among the northern cays.
> On the Mosquito Bank, to the northward of Greytown, the seasons are more marked. During the rainy season the wind generally blows from northeast round by east to southeast. The vendavales, or westerly winds, gradually disappear and become land breezes, which decrease in strength and distance from the shores as Cape Gracias á Dios is approached. Sometimes this breeze will blow over the lagoons to the shore, but no farther.
> The weather at this season is extremely uncertain; the wind is generally fresh, often accompanied by heavy squalls, equal to tornadoes, with torrents of rain, thunder and lightning, and occasionally small blue lights will be seen flickering at the weather yard arms and trucks, the wind at the same time flying about in all directions in furious gusts.
> In the dry season the weather is somewhat more settled and freer from intense electric phenomena. North and northwest winds will sometimes set in suddenly and blow with considerable force for two or three days. They generally, however, give a few hours' warning by dark masses of clouds collecting in those quarters, and it is observed that instead of the wind drawing round previously to the southward it veers from the eastward by north to northwest, then veers back again.
> These winds seldom occur after the first week in March, etc.

Then it goes on and gives a description of the currents:

> From the middle of June to the latter part of August the wind is steady and very fresh from the northeast and gets up a good deal of sea and swells; a strong current sweeps along the coast, running to southward, and causes vessels at anchor to swing across the wind, in which position they roll and pitch very uncomfortably; the rain is heavy and frequent, coming up in fresh squalls which follow close upon one another.
> From September 1 to the middle of October the weather becomes variable, with calm intervals and with the wind frequently off the land, making the anchorage quite smooth. During this period heavy thunder storms from off the land, usually from west to southwest, become frequent.
> From the middle of October to November the northeast wind begins to set in again, with rain squalls, and in early November the wind is frequently very strong from the north, with considerable sea on, and the season of northers begins. Captains and others familiar with the coast say that the northers blow with the greatest violence from the northwest to north, and that vessels can ride them out, as a rule; there is a lee 20 miles to northward under Pearl Cays.

That is a citation of the kind of weather they have in and about Greytown.

In speaking of the danger from northers at Greytown and on the Nicaragua coast of the Caribbean Sea, I am informed by Mr. Emil Boas, the manager in this country of the Hamburg-American Line, which operates the Atlas Line of steamers between New York and Greytown and other Nicaragua ports, that many times the steamers of the Atlas Line have to put to sea from Greytown to avoid being blown ashore by the severe northers which prevail there during December and January; that one of their steamers last winter barely escaped from being blown ashore, and several cargoes had to be abandoned. That is the report of the kind of weather they have near the entrance of the Nicaragua Canal.

Now, Mr. President, I will pass to the question of the practical operation from the standpoint of the vessel.

I hold in my hand a synopsis of a volume of testimony taken from eighty-three owners, captains, and other officers of ocean-going steamers and sailing vessels.

These statements are all signed by the parties making them, with the exception of two or three, who have sent letters of approval.

It must be understood that these questions bearing on the use of an isthmian canal were submitted to the various officers of the different vessels in such a manner as not to indicate the real purpose for which their opinions were asked. In nearly every case the individual officers believed that they were simply giving their personal judgment on the practical use of the two canal routes to their managers and owners, who desired the judgment of such officers in risking their vessels and cargoes in either canal.

In considering the construction of a canal to be used by the ships of the world—ships of all kinds, from the great ocean steamer down to the small coasting schooner—the question of the safe, easy transit of the vessel through the canal must be considered.

Those most concerned in this feature of an isthmian canal proposition are naturally the owners and masters of vessels that may use the canal when completed, as well as the owners of the merchandise carried as cargoes in those vessels.

If it is optional to construct an isthmian canal by two different routes, even if we assume each equally feasible from the constructive standpoint at practically an equal cost, then it is even more important to my mind to ascertain which of the two routes affords the safest, easiest, and cheapest passage for the ship.

A ship and cargo must pay toll, and from the revenue of those tolls the Government is expected to obtain money to continue the operation and maintenance of the canal.

The matter of existing weather conditions along the respective routes of the Panama and Nicaragua canals, and the bearing these weather conditions will have upon the practical operation and the safe passage of vessels through whichever canal is constructed, has been almost entirely overlooked in the discussion of an isthmian canal. Nor has it seemingly occurred to anyone to inquire of shipowners, shipmasters, and pilots themselves—the very men who will use an isthmian canal after it is built—which canal route they prefer, and their reasons therefor.

This matter of taking a vessel safely through the canal is of the greatest concern to thousands of shipowners and captains and to the whole maritime world. If, with a choice of two routes for a canal even if assumed to be practically equal as to feasibility and cost, there are other conditions which make ship owners and masters prefer one route to the other, it would seem a sound business proposition to build the canal preferred by the shipping interests, and which they consider the better, as they are the ones who will use the canal, from them the revenues will come to maintain the canal, and their judgment as to which route insures the safest transit for their ships should be conclusive.

For the purpose of obtaining the opinions on this point of practical shipowners, navigators, and seafaring men, whose experience in the handling of vessels of all kinds, under all sorts of conditions, gives to their opinion the highest value, a list of questions bearing on the practical use of an isthmian canal was submitted to some sixty shipowners, masters, officers, and pilots, and their answers asked to the questions.

These questions were based on the actual conditions to be dealt with at the two isthmian canal routes—Panama and Nicaragua—as set forth in the report and plans of the Isthmian Canal Commission. The weather conditions at each of the two routes were also taken into account.

The idea was to lay before each shipowner or officer whose opinion was sought just the conditions and difficulties he would have to meet and contend with, supposing both canals were constructed on the plans provided by the Isthmian Canal Commission and the shipmaster had to use one or the other. Which of the two he would use and the reasons governing his choice was the information desired.

The following is the matter submitted to every such shipowner, captain, or other officer:

The Isthmian Canal Commission provide for the same-sized canal at both proposed routes, so far as concerns depth and width between banks. The plans call for a canal with 35 feet depth of water and a width between banks of 150 feet on the bottom and 200 feet at the surface. At curves the canal is widened so as to give a width of from 250 to 350 feet. On the Panama Canal there are 29 curves; on the Nicaragua 56, the curves on the Nicaragua being three times sharper than the curves on the Panama.

Mr. HARRIS. I dislike to interrupt the Senator, but I should be very glad to know what is meant there by the statement that the curves on the Nicaragua are three times sharper than are the curves on the Panama. Does that mean that they are one-third radius of the other, or what does it mean?

Mr. HANNA. I am giving the totals of the curvature.

Mr. HARRIS. But the expression there is that certain curves are three times sharper than others.

Mr. HANNA. I suppose by "sharper" is meant not certain curves alone, but the general curvature, which is three times shorter.

Mr. HARRIS. But if by that is meant reducing the radius to one-third of the other, it is certainly contrary to the facts.

Mr. HANNA. I will let the Senator dispute anything I mention.

Mr. HARRIS. I beg the Senator's pardon, Mr. President; I dispute nothing the Senator says. I am simply asking for an explanation.

Mr. HANNA. The explanation that I have to make with reference to the curvatures I have read here several times and, summed up, it is three times as great.

Mr. HARRIS. Then may I ask the Senator if Admiral Walker and the other members of the Commission did not say that adequate curvature had been provided in both cases?

Mr. HANNA. Oh, yes; they said that where the curves were shorter in one place than in another a greater width was given to the channel. Nobody disputes that.

Mr. HARRIS. And they used no curvature that was too great?

Mr. HANNA. No curvature that was so great but that a vessel could get around on either route under certain conditions, and I am going to tell you what the conditions are and what the difficulties are.

Keeping in mind these dimensions, a shipmaster or pilot would encounter the following conditions taking his vessel through the Panama Canal.

PANAMA CANAL.

1. General course of Panama Canal, from north by west to south by east.
2. Little or no wind nine-tenths of the year.
3. Canal 47 miles long from ocean to ocean.
4. From Colon the first 16 miles are at sea level; no current, and the curves very easy.
5. By means of two locks the vessel is lifted to the upper level of the canal, 90 feet above sea level.
6. The first 14 miles of this upper level is a lake 35 to 40 feet deep and from one-half mile to a mile wide. The remaining 9 miles of this upper level is standard-size canal with very slight curves. Current, 2 knots per hour.
7. Then by three locks drop down to the Pacific Ocean level of the canal, which is 8½ miles long, to Panama Bay. The curves in this end are also very easy.
8. Time required for passage from the Atlantic 6-fathom limit to the Pacific 6-fathom limit, twelve hours. Vessel can go through by daylight.

NICARAGUA CANAL.

1. The general course of the Nicaragua Canal from the Atlantic port to Lake Nicaragua (a distance of 100 miles) is northwest, but because of curves a vessel in transit would have a course swinging from south by east around to the westward to due north.
2. A northeast trade wind (mean strength 16 knots) blows constantly athwart the general course of the canal its whole length to the western side of the lake.
3. Canal 187 miles long from ocean to ocean.
4. From Greytown (the Atlantic port) first 40 miles are at sea level with slight current and over 10 curves more than twice as sharp as those on the Panama route.

I guess that answers the question of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. HARRIS. As the Senator challenges me, I say that it does not answer the question. The Senator says "more than twice as sharp." What does that mean? Does it mean that the radius is one-half that of the other?

Mr. HANNA. The Senator will have a good chance to get even with me when he takes the floor and has the opportunity to answer.

Mr. HARRIS. I beg the Senator's pardon. I certainly do not desire to annoy him.

Mr. HANNA. I am depending on this Commission for my technical knowledge.

Mr. HARRIS. That has nothing to do with this matter.

Mr. HANNA. How do you know?

Mr. HARRIS. I do not think it has.

Mr. HANNA. How do you know it has not? You say it has not.

Mr. HARRIS. I understood the Senator to be reading something from some sea captains. I may be mistaken.

Mr. HANNA. Well, I am not mistaken.

5. By four locks lift to the upper level of the canal 110 feet above sea level.
6. This level is mostly standard size, 59 miles long, with many very sharp curves; current, 4 knots per hour, and the entire course exposed to a 16-knot northeast breeze.
7. Enter Lake Nicaragua. General course here about west; lake passage is 70 miles long, of which 20 miles is a dredged channel, leaving 50 miles open to sea speed. Strong northeast to east winds prevail on the lake.
8. Then by four locks to the Pacific end of the canal, a distance of 17 miles, curves slight, wind light.
9. Time required for passage from 6-fathom to 6-fathom limit, 33 hours, proceeding day and night. If lie by at night, time required 2½ days.

The owners, officers, and pilots named above are of the highest rank in their calling. All have had years of experience in sailing vessels before attaining to the high commands they now hold. Many of them hold master mariners' certificates from foreign governments, in addition to their licenses from this Government.

Particular attention is called to the testimony of Captains Watt, W. G. Shackford, Penrice, Fourth Officer Best (steamship St. Paul), Second Officer Church (steamship Vaderland), and Thomson, who have had much experience in taking vessels through the Suez, Manchester, and Kiel canals, and some of these officers having made from 10 to 12 passages through these canals: also to the answers of the 10 shipmasters of Harrington, Me., Capts. E. W. Shackford, H. B. Eaton, Rumball, Leighton, J. B. Eaton, Allen, Cole, and others.

These men represent the coastwise sailing vessel, the very class of shipping which has been put forward as the one to be most benfited by an isthmian canal and for whose use the Nicaragua Canal was the most desirable.

It will be noticed that these shipmasters, owning and commanding nothing but sailing craft, prefer the Panama Canal to the Nicaragua Canal as a short and safe passage from ocean to ocean.

Taking up the questions in their order and summarizing the answers given to each by the officers above named, we find that to question—

1. Supposing both canals to be open to use at an equal toll, and considering canal and wind conditions at each place; taking for example a steamer 450 feet long, drawing 25 feet, which canal would you use?

The answers are unanimous for the Panama Canal.

2. Would you take a steamer through the Panama Canal with her own power except for help at locks?

The answers are:

Capt. JAMES B. WATT. Yes. With a well-found steamer of the above dimensions, the canal could be navigated without any outside help.

Capt. J. G. CAMERON. Certainly.

Capt. J. C. JAMISON. I do not think so unless the curves are very gentle I would require assistance at curves.

Capt. H. E. NICKELS. Yes.

Capts. H. DOXRUD and RIGELSON. No.

Capt. J. DANN. Yes; if twin screws.

Capt. J. W. SHACKFORD. Yes; it would be much safer, however, with two tugs.

Captains DOWNS, BYRNE and JOHNSON. No.

Capt. W. G. SHACKFORD. I would.

Captain PENRICE. No.

The other captains, officers, and pilots all say they would take a vessel through only with the assistance of tugs, saying, however, that one tug would be sufficient.

3. If you would require assistance, how many tugs?

A. Two tugs, with mooring posts on the banks at curves, is the maximum requirement of all the officers in this matter.

4. What speed would you say you could proceed at?

A. Some say 3 knots in the canal, while others say 7; all say very slow at curves.

5. Do you consider a vessel while in the canal in more danger, such as grounding, collision, etc., than in the open sea?

A. Captain Cameron and Pilots Gillespie and Shields say no. The other captains all say yes, a vessel is in much greater danger.

6. Is the absence of wind along the canal route a good or bad feature?

A. Unanimously, "A good feature."

7. Would you take a steamer through the Panama Canal at night?

A. Eight say no, they would not. The others say yes, they would, provided the canal was properly lighted, weather good, and ship supplied with search lights.

8. In using the Nicaragua Canal would you undertake to go through under your own power, considering the curves and winds you would meet?

A. (Unanimously.) No.

9. Would the 16-knot breeze, acting on the broadside of a vessel, have any effect in setting her on to the lee bank?

A. The answers are unanimous to the effect that this wind would undoubtedly force the vessels toward the lee bank and that they would be in great danger of grounding.

10. Do you consider the existence of this wind a source of danger to vessels using the Nicaragua Canal?

Captain WATT. Yes; I have had to tie up in the Suez Canal for that reason in a vessel about 450 feet long.

Captain PENRICE. Yes; as I have often had to stop in Manchester Ship Canal on account of wind on the side.

Capt. J. W. SHACKFORD. Most assuredly.

All the other captains say "Yes."

11. Would a steamer passing around the curves in the Nicaragua Canal at the slow speed necessary, respond to her own helm quick enough to make the turns and also overcome the lee set from the wind?

A. Nearly all of the officers say "No;" and a few believe that it would be impossible from keeping the vessel going aground.

12. Would you undertake to navigate a big steamer through the Nicaragua Canal without the aid of tugs?

A. They are unanimous in saying they would not.

13. Why?

Captain WATT. Because the risk would be so great of getting athwart, blocking the canal as well as damaging the vessel.

Captain CAMERON. For reasons mentioned, the numerous curves and the 16-knot breeze.

Captain JAMISON. Because it would be unsafe.

Captains DOXRUD and RIGLESON. Because it is dangerous on account of the many curves, strong currents, and winds.

Capt. J. W. SHACKFORD. Because I consider it impossible, under the conditions of wind and current described, to make the turns in the Nicaragua Canal without frequently taking the bank either one side or the other.

Captains DOWNES, BYRNE, and JOHNSON. Could not make turns with wind, etc.

Captain PENRICE. Because it would not be safe to keep speed enough on ship to take curves.

Capt. A. RITCHER. Because the curves are too short and the winds too strong.

Capt. H. PRAGER. Because there is twice as much risk in the latter canal than in the Panama.

Capt. F. ALLRECHT. Because there would be danger of getting the steamer aground.

The other officers say that there would be great danger of the vessel grounding, and that it would be impossible for a ship to proceed at all without assistance of tugs.

14. How many tugs would you want?

A. Opinion varies—from two powerful tugs up to five.

15. Do you regard the four-knot current in the upper level of the canal as adding to the danger of grounding?

The answers are unanimous in the affirmative.

16. In using the Nicaragua Canal would you proceed at night?

A. Nineteen say "No." Two say "Yes," and the others say it would depend on the lighting of the canal, condition of weather, and strength of the wind.

17. Would you consider the navigation at night more dangerous than in the daytime?

A. The captains and officers are unanimous in saying that they do consider it more dangerous.

18. From the Atlantic ports of the United States to San Francisco the distance by steamer route is 450 miles shorter via the Nicaragua Canal than via the Panama; that 450 miles representing the distance between the Pacific terminals of the two canals is due to the curvature of the coast line. Considering this and also the time used up in going through the respective canals, as well as the danger of grounding, etc., in either, which route would you take if bound from New York to San Francisco?

A. The replies are unanimous in favor of the Panama route.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator permit me to inquire where this testimony came from, and how it got here? Did it come through the committee or otherwise?

Mr. HANNA. Well, I think a good deal of it came from the same source that yours did.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is not an answer to my question.

Mr. HANNA. In all good nature, Mr. President, I do not want to be interrupted, for I am very tired and I want to get through.

Mr. MITCHELL. I really want to know, if it is proper that I should know.

Mr. HANNA. If it is proper that you should know, when the proper time comes I will give you the information.

Mr. MITCHELL. Is not this the proper time?

Mr. HANNA. I have said that the information comes from the owners of vessels, and from captains, masters, pilots, and other vessel officers.

Mr. MITCHELL. In answer to what?

Mr. HANNA. In answer to questions put to them.

Mr. MITCHELL. By whom?

Mr. HANNA. By the parties who asked the questions.

Mr. MITCHELL. Who were they?

Mr. HANNA. I must beg the Senator's pardon. I object to the Senator's question.

Mr. MITCHELL. Were the questions put by the Isthmian Canal Commission?

Mr. HANNA. No.

M. MITCHELL. Or by any of the members of that Commission?

Mr. HANNA. They were obtained to controvert the testimony of one man. I am answering your question.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President——

Mr. HANNA. I insist on your hearing me through.

Mr. MITCHELL. Very well.

Mr. HANNA. They are answers to questions to controvert the testimony of one man, and only one man, who was brought before the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, an old sailor, who had sailed a ship from Panama to some point on the South American coast for seven months, who was put upon the stand as an expert, to show what the conditions are. I am trying to demonstrate the relative value and the operation and feasibility of these canals. That man was not one of the witnesses before the Commission, but before the committee. I made no objection at that time, Mr. President, and I do not propose to offer an objection now; but the resolution of this Senate, which delegated the power to that committee to send for persons and papers and summon before them witnesses, was intended in its spirit, if not in its letter, to be confined to the members of the United States Commission, but there were brought before that committee all kinds of witnesses, and this sailor man—I do not remember his name—was one of them. He testified under conditions which demonstrated to my mind that he knew what he was going to say when he came there, and that what he stated as facts were not correct.

I instigated these inquiries through proper channels——

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. HANNA. When I get through. I am wound up now and I want to finish what I have to say.

I made these inquiries through proper channels and through proper motives, for the same reason that I have moved inch by inch and foot by foot in this investigation to arrive at the facts and the truth about all these conditions, in order that I might present to my colleagues in the Senate a fair statement; and if any effort which I could make as a member of that committee would bring any facts and information before this body which would aid them in sifting this evidence and satisfying themselves, then I feel that I have done my duty, and that I ought not to be questioned as to how, when, or where I obtained the facts and the information.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator allow me one moment now?

Mr. HANNA. You can have two or three moments.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have not questioned the propriety of anything the Senator from Ohio has done in regard to this matter. I do insist, however, that we have a right to know if the Senator has gone outside of the investigation that is being conducted by the committee and has made an investigation of his own. I do not deny that he has a perfect right to do that, if he could get information that would be of value upon this question, but is it not proper that we should know what kind of questions were put to these men——

Mr. HANNA. I have read every one of the questions.

Mr. MITCHELL. And who put the questions to the men, and all about it.

Mr. HANNA. I have read every question. The questions were put to those men in writing. They were written questions.

Mr. MITCHELL. Does the statement give the names of the questioners?

Mr. HANNA. The questions are here in writing, and the answers were given in writing by the men of whom the questions were asked.

Mr. MITCHELL. Does the statement from which the Senator is reading give the name of the person who asked the questions?

Mr. HANNA. No; it does not give the name of the person who asked the questions. It was not confined to one person. I used whatever means of acquaintance I happened to have in vessel circles. I have had a great deal of such experience, and I know many of those people myself personally. I have written letters to vessel owners and vessel captains, and I have asked the companies who sail these big ships to give me the facts, and in writing in answer to written questions the facts are given in writing by the men who navigate their ships.

Mr. MITCHELL. I want to suggest that the sailor of whom the Senator speaks, whose name the Senator does not remember, and whose name I do not remember at this time, was subjected to cross-examination. He was before the committee, and the Senator from Ohio and other members of the committee had a right to cross-question him. Now we are confronted, however, by testimony given in an investigation outside, where no member of the committee, certainly except the minority, had the opportunity to put a single question to a witness.

Mr. HANNA. I will give the Senator every one of the names of these witnesses, and he can send a man to cross-examine them if he wants to do so.

Mr. MITCHELL. I simply want to get at the facts.

Mr. HANNA. I make the statement upon my own responsibility that they are facts, and I want to go on record to that effect.

Mr. HARRIS. I hope it will not excite the Senator's impatience, but I infer from what he has said that the questions the answers to which he was reading a while ago and also the question of curvature which came up were not propounded by the Commission.

Mr. HANNA. I did not say they were propounded by the Commission or by the committee.

Mr. HARRIS. I have not said that you did say so.

Mr. HANNA. No.

Mr. HARRIS. I should like to know whether the Senator will say now who is the person who propounded the proposition that the curvature in one canal is three times as sharp as it is in the other.

Mr. HANNA. That is a pretty sharp question.

Mr. HARRIS. But it is easily answered, Mr. President, if the Senator desires to answer it.

Mr. HANNA. Well, I decline to answer further. I have not got down to such details as that. I will continue the summary of written questions and answers:

19. Considering the longer time required to pass through the Nicaragua Canal and its greater dangers, and the fact that in using the Panama Canal sea speed could be resumed so much sooner than via Nicaragua, do you think in the practical use of the canal there would be any actual saving in time between Atlantic and Pacific ports via the Nicaragua Canal?

Answer. Captain WATT. No. On the contrary, there would be a saving of time by taking the Panama route.

Captain CAMERON. I think a great loss would be experienced in using the Nicaragua Canal.

Capt. J. W. SHACKFORD. In my opinion there would be a saving of time by using the Panama Canal.

Capt. F. ALLRECHT. Considering the existing conditions and the fact that in using the Panama Canal sea speed could be resumed much sooner, there would be no actual saving of time between Atlantic and Pacific ports via Nicaragua Canal.

Capt. JOSHUA SLOCUM. No. On the contrary, there would be a loss of time, greater or less, according to the sea speed of the ship.

Capt. H. O. NEILSEN. The saving in time would be in favor of the Panama Canal.

The others unite in saying, "No, there would be no saving in time via Nicaragua."

20. In the case of sailing vessels. The calms which prevail in the Bay of Panama most of the year have been quoted as a detriment to the Panama Canal as a route for sailing craft, while the trade wind which blows at Nicaragua route has been referred to as a very favorable factor there. The general impression in Congress is that sailing vessels will sail right through the Nicaragua Canal, regardless of the fact that the canal is only 200 feet wide, full of curves, and the eastern portion subject to daily and violent squalls of rain and wind. Would not a sailing vessel have to be towed through either canal?

Captain WATT. Yes; sailing vessels, using the term in its ordinary sense, would have to be towed.

Captain CAMERON. I think it impractible for a sailing vessel to sail through the Nicaragua Canal without going ashore. In my opinion sailing vessels would have to be towed through either canal.

Capt. W. G. SHACKFORD. Most certainly, in all cases.

Captain JAMISON. It would be impossible for a sailing ship to go through without tugs.

Captains DOXRUD and RIGELSON. Yes, in our opinion it is impossible to sail through either canal with safety.

Capt. J. W. SHACKFORD. Most certainly. I consider it an impossibility for a sailing vessel to pass through either canal under canvass. She would have to be towed through, her sails furled and her higher spars struck or housed.

Captain SLOCUM. The sailing ship would certainly have to be towed through the Nicaragua Canal.

Capt. H. O. NEILSEN. It would be dangerous to try to navigate a sailing ship through any canal; if caught in a squall aback, she would without fail be on the bank, and most likely the rigging over the side; besides a ship under sail in close quarters would be a menace to any other vessel going through the canal. A sailing ship should be compelled by law to use tugs.

The others say that all sailing vessels would have to be towed through the canal.

21. Which route would be the easiest to tow through?

The answer is unanimous in favor of the Panama Canal.

22. Would the strong winds at Nicaragua have such effect on the masts and yards of a vessel as to blow her on to the lee bank of the canal?

The officers are unanimous in saying that the wind is bound to affect more or less a vessel in the matter of giving her leeway; some express the opinion that the resistance offered by the masts and yards of the vessel would be so great as to make it almost impossible to prevent her grounding, while others say that the vessel could be kept in the channel only with great difficulty and the assistance of powerful tugs.

23. Would the passage of a sailing ship bound east through the Nicaragua Canal with a 4-knot current running the same way and a beam wind be any more difficult or dangerous than for a vessel west bound against that current and wind abeam?

The answers are, "Yes. The passage is more dangerous and difficult with the current than against it."

24. Could the curves be rounded as safely one way as the other?

The answers are, Yes and No; the opinion of the officers is much divided, depending on the appliances which would be at hand for checking the steamer's headway.

25. Consider both canals open, and yourself bound from New York to San Francisco in a sailing ship, using the Nicaragua Canal you would have to be towed through the entire length—187 miles.

Through the Panama Canal you would also be towed 47 miles. By keeping your tug which would take you through the Panama Canal and letting it tow you straight out to sea 140 miles, you are out of the calm belt and have wind, having towed the same distance only as you would to have gotten through the Nicaragua Canal.

In view of all the conditions, winds, curves, calms, etc., governing each route, which canal would you use?

The answers are unanimously for Panama.

26. Why?

Captain WATT. Because it would be more safe, more expeditious, and more economical to do so.

Captain JAMISON. Because I consider the Nicaragua route an impracticable canal to navigate with a 4-knot current.

Capt. W. G. SHACKFORD. I do not consider the longer distance from Panama to the Pacific ports an element to be taken into consideration when one is choosing which route to go by, as it is more than made up by less danger and quicker transit of the Panama Canal, even if the tug—in case of a sailing vessel—had to tow her for twice the difference in distance of the two routes, after getting in the Pacific.

Capt. H. E. NICKELS. Less time and less danger.

Captains DOXRUD and RIGELSON. The route is shorter and less dangerous.

Capt. J. W. SHACKFORD. Because of the shorter route, fewer curves, of less sharpness, and less current.

Captains DOWNS, BYRNE, and JOHNSON. It is shorter and safer.

Chief Officer MARSDEN, S. S. Philadelphia. Less risk, with shorter distance and fewer and longer curves.

Chief Officer FRANCKE, S. S. Friesland. Less wind, less current, less locks, less time; therefore, less danger.

Capt. CHARLES W. ROGERS. Easier of navigating; therefore, less dangers.

Capt. J. DANN. It's the safest and most expeditious.

Capt. W. D. BURNHAM. Because the shorter the canal the less danger, less liable to detention in the canal, and in practice actually believe there would be saving of time between ports by using the Panama Canal and towing through the calm belt at the western end.

Inspector DUNNING (Atlantic Mutual Insurance Company). Owing to the shorter distance and time, less danger than by Nicaragua Canal.

Capt. H. O. NIELSEN. Because of the shorter distance of "canal dangers" and the calm and open sea of "no danger."

The ten Maine owners and captains of sailing vessels all say because of less time in the canal.

The New York pilots: The safest and shorter and easier inland navigation.

The others give similar reasons.

27. Do you think that in the event of the construction of either of these canals the coastwise traffic will be done entirely by steam?

A. The majority of the captains and officers believe that it will be.

28. Would the continuous passage of a vessel through the 70 miles of fresh water in Lake Nicaragua have any appreciable effect on the foul growth and barnacles on her hull?

The answers are almost unanimous in saying it would have little or no effect, because of the short time in fresh water.

In the testimony given before the Senate Committee on Interoceanic Canals at the several hearings on the canal subject, three or four features received much attention as being of especial advantage to the Nicaragua route, or of disadvantage to the Panama route. Those features were the strong trade wind which prevails along the line of the Nicaragua Canal, which was said to be a very favorable factor to that canal, as it would enable sailing vessels to sail through from ocean to ocean and thereby avoid the expense of being towed; (2) the lack of wind at Panama and the doldrums which prevail in the Bay of Panama were set forth as a great disadvantage to that route, because, as it was stated, sailing craft could not use the Panama route; (3) the great benefit vessels would derive from passing through Lake Nicaragua, because the action of the fresh water on the sea growth on their hulls, it was said, would leave the same clean as a result of their passage through the lake.

This testimony has been incorporated in the report of the Senate committee and these features made much of by the advocates of the Nicaragua route.

It is interesting, therefore, to read the opinions of shipmasters of the highest standing and of practical experience in handling ships in canals, as well as pilots who daily handle vessels of all kinds in channel ways of even greater width and depth of water than would be found in either canal.

The unanimous opinion of all the captains and pilots to whom the question was submitted (see their individual statements, which I have quoted) is that the absence of wind at the Panama route is a good feature, as it insures much safer navigation of the canal. They are equally unanimous in saying that the strong trade wind which blows across the route of the Nicaragua Canal is a source of much danger to vessels using that route as it would give any steamer, particularly one that was light, a set to leeward, the majority of the officers believing that it would be impossible to keep a vessel with this wind blowing on her broadside from going aground on the lee bank of the canal. Captain Watt, of the steamship Campania, states that on several occasions when passing through the Suez Canal he was forced to tie up until the wind subsided. He estimated the strength of the wind he encountered in the Suez Canal at 15 knots. (The average strength of the trade winds at Nicaragua is 16 knots.)

Capt. O. Penrice, of the steamship Camoens, of the Lamport and Holt Line, makes six trips a year through the Manchester Ship Canal. He states that many times he has been forced to make fast to mooring posts at the bank because the prevalence of a 10 to 12 knot breeze on the side made it impossible for him to proceed and keep from going aground on the lee bank.

Capt. W. G. Shackford has taken his steamer through the Manchester and Kiel canals several times and has had the same experience with wind as the captains above named.

Contrary to the general opinion, based somewhat upon the reports of the Senate Committee on Interoceanic Canals, that the Nicaragua route is particularly advantageous for sailing vessels because of the prevalence of the trade wind, which, it is believed, would enable them to sail through the canal and so save any expense of towage, the shipmasters are unanimous in saying that it will be absolutely impossible to sail a vessel through the Nicaragua Canal.

They say that in the first place there is not room enough to tack a vessel; that the average leeway a sailing vessel makes, especially with the wind abeam and at slow speed at curves, would put her on the lee bank of the canal before she had gone any distance; that it will be utterly impossible for her to make the turns in the canal unassisted, and that a vessel bound from the Pacific to the Atlantic Ocean will have a head wind a great portion of the distance.

In the case of a sailing ship, the masts and yards of which, even with the canvas snugly furled, offer a great deal of resistance to wind, the danger of being blown onto the canal banks will be even greater than with a steamer. It is the opinion of the shipmasters that it would be difficult to tow the modern sailing ship through the Nicaragua Canal with safety, so far as grounding is concerned, because of the great pressure which the wind would exert on its spars, thereby blowing it sideways onto the canal bank.

The shipmasters and pilots are unanimous in saying that, because of the absence of wind at the Panama route, they would prefer to go through that canal, as its passage would be less hazardous.

The ten Maine shipmasters, whose interest is entirely in sailing craft engaged in the coastwise trade, the class of shipping which the Senate committee in its report states will be most benefited by the construction of the Nicaragua Canal, are unanimous in saying that if both canals were opened at an equal toll they would use the Panama Canal, because of the shorter time the ship would be in a canal and in danger, and because the absence of winds along the Panama Canal renders the transit there from ocean to ocean less difficult and dangerous than via Nicaragua. In giving this opinion they took into consideration the fact that their vessels would have to be towed at least 150 miles to sea after emerging from the Panama Canal into the Pacific before they would find sufficienf wind to proceed on their voyage without the assistance of tugs.

Another consideration of importance is the cost of assistance from tugs.

The expense of taking any craft, steamer, or sailing vessel through an isthmian canal will be much less by the Panama route than by the Nicaragua route according to the statements of the shipmasters. In response to questions Nos. 2, 3, 12, and 14, already quoted, as to whether the assistance of tugs would be required in navigating the canals and the amount of such assistance, the replies show that while a few state that they would pass through the Panama Canal without any assistance whatever, except for mooring posts at the entrance to locks, all the others say that the most assistance they would require would be two tugs. On the other hand, they say that they would not undertake to pass through the Nicaragua Canal without the assistance of from two to five powerful tugs.

As to the effect of fresh water on barnacles, etc., the opinions of the shipmasters are directly at variance with statements made to the Senate committee and embodied in their report. They are unanimous in saying that from their experience with vessels in fresh-water ports the action of the fresh water of Lake Nicaragua on barnacles and foul growth on the hulls of vessels which would pass through the canal and lake would have little or no effect in removing that growth. To obtain any benefit from the action of fresh water in removing the foul growth from the bottoms of the vessels the shipmasters say it would be necessary for the vessel to remain in the fresh water for from four to six weeks. They say there is nothing in this argument worthy of consideration in taking into account the advantages and disadvantages of the two proposed canal routes.

I wish so say further, in connection with the testimony which I have just read, that I have here in this book the questions to and answers of every one of these men, their names, the vessels they sail, and the names of the owners, and all are in writing; and if anyone has curiosity about them or questions the authenticity of the statements, he is at liberty to examine the originals of the statements.

There was but one purpose in my mind in seeking this information. Nearly all my life I have had to do with the navigation of ships on the Great Lakes. Many of them to-day are as large as the average ship which would go through the canal. We have difficult and dangerous navigation through the straits of those lakes, rapidly being improved. I know what it means to have the wind abeam and a strong current against you. I know what it means to have a vessel take a sheer when she is running at slow speed. I have been on ships many times when they have gone onto a bank under such conditions.

Knowing that and appreciating fully the dangers and delays in the operation of a canal like this, and not wishing to claim a standing here as an expert, I took advantage of my acquaintance with those connected with the great maritime interests of this country to obtain these facts, not with a view of producing evidence to gain a simple point, but to submit them to my colleagues as facts, vouched for by myself as correctly taken, and in written form open to your examination.

I am not carried away by any pride of opinion in my choice of these routes.

I said yesterday that, in common with many of my fellow-citizens, I entered upon this question imbued with the same sentiment that has inspired us all for years past, that the time must come, sooner or later, when, if a canal was built to connect the Caribbean Sea and the Pacific Ocean, it must be built, owned, and operated by the United States.

I started on the work connected with that committee with the honest and earnest desire to accomplish that purpose; and if the work on the isthmian canal is not commenced by the United States Government in the year 1902 it will not be my fault.

I have heard insinuations on the streets and elsewhere as to the motives which have prompted those who, in the progress of this canal subject, have been led at least to believe that after all, and fortunately so, the way was open to us to buy and to finish a canal at a place recommended by the best talent available in the world as the best, a canal to be constructed for the benefit of all nations. While misfortune has met the Panama enterprise as to its finances, there has been no evidence produced here or elsewhere, to my knowledge, which controverts the statement that the work done so far, from the beginning to this moment, has been on the line of the best possible engineering policy and methods.

We have inherited this opportunity. It has come to us without our seeking, simply because the people of the United States had developed a determination to carry to the finish the great work of a canal. I repeat—and I repeat it with pride as an American citizen—that the inspiration of this great work does not come from any selfish or narrow motive.

If a canal is built and is operated, it will be built and operated by the American people.

But there is one condition to which I wish to call your attention before closing. If, as I claim, the route of the Panama Canal is the best for the canal, and if for any cause we should decide to construct a canal along the Nicaragua route, what assurance and what guaranty have we that some other nation or parties may not decide to finish the Panama Canal upon its responsibility?

With the growing wealth of this country and of others; with capital eagerly and boldly seeking investment; with the complications of nations in the struggle for supremacy and commerce; with a full and high appreciation of the value of this great work, offensive and defensive, in war; with the jealousy which may arise at any time through the channels of commerce in contests with other nations who, as we well know, have wealth and enterprise as well as the United States,is it not possible, Mr. President, that there may be two canals, should we build the Nicaragua Canal?

If we are to be a competitor with the Panama Canal, then, in my judgment, we would be at a great disadvantage because of all the points which I have attempted to make by a comparison of the two routes. Our competitors would have all the advantages that I have outlined as existing in favor of the Panama Canal.

Gentlemen must consider, as a commercial and business proposition, the cost of maintenance and operation, where there is an acknowledged difference between the two in favor of Panama of $1,300,000 per annum, the interest at Government rates, as I said yesterday, on $65,000,000.

I have heard it urged that we ought not to consider the commercial side of this question. Mr. President, the commercial side of this question is the one side which interests all the people, East and West, North and South.

It is to aid in the development of each section of our country alike.

The opportunities which will be given geographically to one section over another will be to the benefit of that particular section, but we are trying to serve the whole people and the whole country.

It is to be a canal which will benefit the people of the United States and the people of the universe.

If there is any pride or sentiment in this proposition let us carry it to the high level of doing that which will place the United States where she belongs as a leader of civilization and humanity.

Let us not discuss in detail the technique as to whether the mouth of the canal is nearer to New Orleans or to Pensacola or to Norfolk or to Baltimore or to New York.

Commerce will flow in natural channels. Economics will control results. But shall we stop to consider the question as to who will get the best of it? Who will stop to discuss whether in the equation of payments one section of this country will pay more or less than another?

Where will you look for inspiration upon any great public question if you eliminate the necessities of the people by sneeringly calling them "commerce" or "commercial value?"

Mr. President, there is nothing inconsistent from a national and patriotic standpoint with the ambition and the aims connected with this enterprise, if we at the same time consider on parallel lines the material benefits which it is going to bring to the whole people. If we had the canal built to-day, after passing through all these discussions, and if we found that we had made a mistake in our selection, we would feel, as I have said, that something personal or sectional or otherwise had influenced our decision as against the advice and the judgment and the information furnished us by the highest possible authorities in the United States or elsewhere.

Now, Mr. President, in closing for to-day, although there are many other matters which I may be called upon to present later, I wish to have it understood, so far as concerns the work of the committee, that those of us who have joined in the minority report have merely sought to give to this body the result of our judgment as to what is for the best interest of our country—the whole country.

Mr. BACON. I beg leave to present two amendments which I design to offer at the proper time. One of them is to the bill now pending and the other is an amendment to the proposed amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER]. I ask that the amendments be read and printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendments will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Amendments intended to be proposed by Mr. BACON to the bill (H. R. 3110) to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans.

1. On page 2, line 3, strike out the words "Secretary of War" and insert in lieu thereof the words "Isthmian Canal Commission hereinafter authorized."

2. On page 2, lines 10 and 11, strike out the words "Secretary of War" and insert in lieu thereof the words "Isthmian Canal Commission, under the direction of the President."

3. On page 3, line 6, strike out the words "Secretary of War" and insert in lieu thereof the words "said Isthmian Canal Commission, subject to the approval of the President."

4. On page 3, after the word "defenses," at the end of said line, insert the words "or any part thereof."

5. Add an additional section to said bill, to be known as section 7, as follows:

"To enable the President to construct the canal and works appurtenant thereto as provided in this act, there is hereby created the Isthmian Canal Commission, the same to be composed of seven members who shall be nominated and appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and who shall serve during the pleasure of the President. Of the seven members of said Commission, at least four of them shall be persons learned and skilled in the science of engineering, and at least one shall be an officer of the United States Army and one other shall be an officer of the United States Navy, the said officers respectively being either upon the active or the retired list of the Army and the Navy. Said commissioners shall receive as their compensation the sum of —— dollars per annum and such additional allowance for expenses as may be allowed by the President in his discretion. In addition to the members of said Isthmian Canal Commission, the President is hereby authorized to employ in said service any of the engineers of the United States Army at his discretion, and likewise to employ any engineers in civil life at his discretion, and any other persons necessary to make such investigation, and to fix the compensation of any and all of such engineers and other persons. Said Commission shall in all matters be subject to the direction and control of the President, and shall make to the President annually and at such other periods as may be required, either by law or by the order of the President, full and complete reports of all their actings and doings in the construction of said work and in the performance of their duties in connection therewith. And the said Commission shall futhermore give to Congress, or either House of Congress, such information as may be required, either by act of Congress or by the order of either House of Congress."

Mr. BACON. I do not think it will be necessary to read the other amendment, because it is practically the same. In fact, the sections just read, providing for the creation of a commission, are identical, and the other amendment simply adapts it to what is known as the Spooner amendment. It is the same scheme provided for in the amendment proposed to the original bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments will be printed and lie on the table.

The second amendment proposed by Mr. BACON is as follows:

Amendments intended to be proposed to the amendment proposed by Mr. SPOONER to the bill (H. R. 3110) to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans.

1. On page 3, line 12, strike out the words "Secretary of War" and insert in lieu thereof the words "Isthmian Canal Commission hereinafter authorized."

2. On page 3, line 22, strike out the words "Secretary of War" and insert in lieu thereof the words "said Isthmian Canal Commission under the direction of the President."

3. On page 3, line 24, after the word "and," insert the words "the President shall."

4. On page 4, line 1, strike out the sentence beginning with the word "That" and ending with the word "compensation," in line 3.

5. On page 4, line 15, strike out the words "Secretary of War" and insert the words "said Isthmian Canal Commission."

6. On page 4, line 24, strike out the words "Secretary of War" and insert the words "said Isthmian Canal Commission."

7. On page 5, line 1, after the word "and" and before the word "shall," insert the words "the President."

8. On page 5, line 4, after the word "cause," insert the words "the said Isthmian Canal Commission to make."

9. On page 5, line 5, after the word "harbors," strike out all the remainder of said sentence to and including the word "compensation," in the eighth line.

10. On page 5, line 15, strike out the words "Secretary of War" and insert the words "said Isthmian Canal Commission, subject to the approval of the President."

11. On page 5, in line 18, after the word "defenses," insert the words "or any part thereof."

12. Add an additional section to said amendment, to be known as section 7, as follows:

"To enable the President to construct the canal and works appurtenant thereto as provided in this act there is hereby created the Isthmian Canal Commission, the same to be composed of seven members, who shall be nominated and appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and who shall serve during the pleasure of the President. Of the seven members of said commission at least four of them shall be persons learned and skilled in the science of engineering, and at least one shall be an officer of the United States Army, and one shall be an officer of the United States Navy, the said officers, respectively, being either upon the active or the retired list of the Army or of the Navy. Said commissioners shall receive as their compensation the sum of —— dollars per annum and such additional allowance for expenses as may be allowed by the President, in his discretion. In addition to the members of said Isthmian Canal Commission the President is hereby authorized to employ in said service any of the engineers of the United States Army, at his discretion, and likewise to employ any engineers in civil life, at his discretion, and any other persons necessary for the proper and expeditious prosecution of said work, and to fix the compensation of any and all of such engineers and other persons. Said commission shall in all matters be subject to the direction and control of the President, and shall make to the President, annually and at such other periods as may be required either by law or by the order of the President, full and complete reports of all their actings and doings in the construction of said work and in the performance of their duties in connection therewith, which said reports shall be by the President transmitted to Congress. And the said commission shall furthermore give to Congress, or either House of Congress, such information as may at any time be required, either by act of Congress or by the order of either House of Congress."

Mr. MITCHELL. I desire to take the floor on the pending bill.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. MITCHELL. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. HARRIS. I merely desire to give notice that on the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Oregon to-morrow I shall address the Senate on the pending bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, on the 11th day of March the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] had printed as a document a communication from Mr. G. A. Karwiese, civil and consulting engineer, of Louisville, Ky., in reference to an interoceanic canal. I know nothing about the matter beyond the fact that it is a brief and very interesting document, and I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that a document printed by order of the Senate be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The document referred to is as follows;

[Senate Document No. 245, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session.]

PANAMA CANAL ROUTE.

[March 11, 1902.—Referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals and ordered to be printed.]

Mr. BLACKBURN presented the following memorial from Mr. G. A. Karwiese, civil and consulting engineer, Louisville, Ky., setting forth the advantages of a certain route for the construction of the Panama Canal:

200 GRAY STREET, Louisville, Ky.

To the honorable Senators and Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The act of Congress approved March 3, 1899, contemplated a full investigation of the Isthmus of Panama, with a view of discovering the best and most feasible route for an isthmus canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific oceans.

Having spent several years upon the Isthmus, and made eight surveys across the same, I respectfully present for your consideration the shortest, best, and cheapest route of all yet discovered, being between the Gulf of San Miguel, through the Aputi Valley, on the Pacific, and the Boca del Atrato, a part of the Gulf of Darien, on the Atlantic side of the Isthmus.

My explorations were the most comprehensive and exhaustive that have ever been made, and the route for an Isthmus ship canal herein recommended is entirely new and heretofore unexplored, and the canal proper is outside the concessions made by the United States of Colombia to the Panama Canal Company.

By an examination of the map of Colombia it will be observed that the Gulf of San Miguel makes an indentation of several miles into the Isthmus, furnishing a safe harbor for sheltering or repairing vessels, and the same conditions exist in the Gulf of Darien, thus supplying what no other route does.

Said route will require a canal less than 18 miles in length from tide water on the Pacific to tide water on the Atlantic, with a mountain obstruction of about 1½ miles, requiring a tunnel, which is no formidable obstruction in this age of scientific engineering.

This will be virtually a sea-level canal, the proposed locks at either end of the canal being for the purpose of regulating the tidal flow between the two oceans and controlling the waters that supply the canal and eliminate all danger of a lack or a surplus of water.

The locks are estimated for at 800 feet in length, 88 feet in width, and 32 feet in depth (inside measurement), capable of accommodating the largest ships in existence, or that are liable to be constructed.

The estimated cost of constructing this canal, including locks, tunnels, and dams for controlling the water, is $48,000,000, with a liberal margin for unforeseen contingencies.

While the distance between the tide waters of the Atlantic and Pacific is only 18 miles, it will probably be found advisable to place the locks farther apart.

The advantages of a sea-level canal, with only two locks, can be readily understood over a canal with numerous locks that have to raise and lower vessels 108 feet and 8 inches.

The abundance of surplus water upon the Aputi Valley route I propose to utilize in erecting and operating electric power and light plants to be used first in constructing the tunnel, and afterwards in lighting the tunnel and for moving all vessels through the canal from ocean to ocean, and for such other purposes as modern science and invention may require along the route of the canal.

SOME OF THE ADVANTAGES OF THE APUTI ROUTE.

First. It is the shortest feasible route between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans yet discovered, and the only available sea-level route, requiring only two locks, one at each terminal, for the purpose of controlling the navigable water level between the locks, and at the same time furnish protection against ocean tidal overflows.

Second. The cost of construction will not be one-third of the amount required to complete any other proposed canal, nor will it cost one-third as much to maintain after completion; consequently the tonnage charges could be two-thirds less.

Third. No other proposed canal has such ample and safe natural harbors at either terminal for the protection of shipping, and in fact at the terminals of either the Panama or Nicaraguan routes these harbors must be constructed at a very large outlay of money, estimated at $10,000,000 each, or $20,000,000 for both.

Fourth. At each lock can be constructed dry docks, one for sailing vessels and one for steamers, where all necessary repairs can be made.

Fifth. The surplus water can be utilized for producing immense electrical power for propelling vessels through the canal, for lighting the tunnel, and for other purposes.

Sixth. It is free from financial complications and volcanic disturbances.

Seventh. The tide waters of the Atlantic and Pacific approach nearer, with less intermediate obstruction, than at any other points on the Isthmus.

Believing that no investigation and report contemplated by the act of Congress of March 3, 1899, would be complete that did not embrace the route discovered by myself, and believing, furthermore, that a commission composed of experienced and practical engineers would, upon examination, favor my route over all others, I respectfully submit the brief statement herein made for your consideration and action. I desire to state that I was associated with M. Ferdinand de Lesseps as a civil engineer in his successful Suez Canal enterprise, and afterwards in the same capacity with him on the Panama Canal route.

I was engaged with Captain Eads in his Mississippi River project to supply deep water to the Gulf, and I have visited and carefully examined every great engineering work and tunnel in Europe and America.

I have traversed the routes of both the Panama and Nicaragua canals and the Isthmus of Panama from Lake Nicaragua to the Gulf of Darien, and made eight surveys in as many years across the Isthmus, and I believe I am more conversant with the topography of the Isthmus of Panama than any other man living; hence my desire to give the Government of the United States, my adopted country, the benefit of my knowledge and experience, and, if possible, to prevent it squandering a large amount of money upon a canal which, if ever completed, will prove an expensive and worthless failure.

Very respectfully,

G. A. KARWIESE,
Civil and Consulting Engineer.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, June 6, 1902.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

COMPENSATION OF GEN. LEONARD A. WOOD.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs to submit the following privileged report on House resolution 278, and move that the resolution lie on the table.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War is requested to furnish to the House, if not incompatible with the public interest, the following information: What salary or other compensation has been paid to Gen. Leonard A. Wood, late governor-general of Cuba, during the occupation of Cuba by the military forces of the United States, and by what authority and under what law such salary or compensation has been paid.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to file the views of the minority of the committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia files the views of the minority.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I want to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. As I understand it, Mr. Speaker, the committee recommends that this resolution lie on the table, and I want to inquire whether or not the motion of the gentleman by the instruction of the committee is debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is not debatable.

Mr. DALZELL. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DALZELL. Is not this resolution identical, or almost identical, with the one disposed of yesterday?

The SPEAKER. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. BARTLETT. I make the point of order, Mr. Speaker, that the motion is debatable, and I would like to be heard on that point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. BARTLETT. This is a resolution, Mr. Speaker, which was introduced on the 28th day of May, a resolution of inquiry addressed to the Secretary of War for certain information to be furnished to the House. The resolution has not been reported until to-day. It became a privileged resolution on the 4th instant, the week having expired within which the committee did not make a report.

Now, I desire to call the attention of the Chair to certain parliamentary precedents on the subject. I call attention to section 426 and following sections of Hinds's Parliamentary Precedents, which contain rulings of the Chair on various questions of this sort, and which declare that resolutions of inquiry not being reported within the week, a motion to discharge the committee from consideration of it presents a question of privilege. That is to be found on page 3275 of the RECORD of the Forty-seventh Congress. That is the rule:

A resolution of inquiry may be reported back at any time within a week, and is privileged for consideration when reported.

The resolution becomes privileged in two ways, Mr. Speaker. It is privileged when the committee reports it within the week. The committee may fail to report it within a week, and then it becomes privileged, to be called up at the instance of any member of the House, and because it is so privileged after the week has expired it is reported for consideration.

Now, I refer the Chair to section 430 of Hinds's Parliamentary Precedents, and also to page 6218 of the RECORD of the Fifty-second Congress and page 625 of the Fifty-sixth Congress. I do not mean to say by reference to these citations that they are exactly in point with that which I make in this case, but the point I make now is that the committee having failed to report this resolution within the week, by such failure it becomes a privileged resolution, just as much so as a veto of the President upon a bill becomes a privileged matter, to be called up by any member of the House at any time. And being so privileged, it is privileged for consideration.

I make the point of order that the report which comes in after six days and after the time fixed by the rule has become privileged matter for consideration, and I make the point that a report which proposes simply to lay a resolution on the table is not the consideration contemplated by the rules and the precedents established by the House. It is simply laid on the table and not considered at all. It might be said, although I do not think it is so, that after it was laid on the table, being a privileged resolution, any member of the House could move to take it from the table and have a vote upon it, just as you could a bill vetoed by the President which had been laid on the table.

I raise the point of order and ask the Chair to decide whether or not, this being a privileged resolution and being under the rules a privileged resolution for consideration, a report recommending that the resolution lie on the table or a motion made by the chairman of the committee is one that must be considered by the House?

The SPEAKER. There is no difficulty at all about this question; it is well settled again and again.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, before the Chair rules, I desire to submit one matter to the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule, but will hear the gentleman.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I do not wish to delay this matter; but it is well established that there are certain motions which are privileged, and, as I understand parliamentary law, you can not apply one privileged motion to another privileged motion. A motion to adjourn, for instance, is of the highest privilege; and you can not apply to a motion to adjourn a motion to lay on the table.

The motions which are privileged in their nature and character are specified in the rules; and, as I have just said, it is, as I understand, the universal rule that you can not apply one of these privileged motions to another. A motion to adjourn, a motion to postpone indefinitely, a motion to lay on the table, can not be laid on the table. In other words, no one of these motions, being privileged, can be superseded by a similar motion. I do not see how the motion to lay on the table can be applied to this privileged motion—a motion made privileged under the rule which has been cited.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee must bear in mind that the matter reported by the committee is not a motion, but is a resolution. As the Chair was about to state, the question here presented is a very simple one and has been repeatedly decided. The rules give a committee one week within which to report back a resolution of this character—a resolution of inquiry addressed to the head of a department. If, as in this case, a resolution of this character, referred to a committee, is not reported back within a week, the rule and the decisions contemplate that any member of the House may protect the interests of the House by calling up the resolution for consideration. That becomes a privilege of the House. But there is no decision that divests the committee or the member representing the committee of the right, the privilege—the Chair might say the duty—of reporting the resolution when it can be done.

Now, while the matter does not bear at all upon the parliamentary situation, it is proper to say that the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs was ready to report this resolution within the week. But the Chair was very anxious to keep the right of way for the Judiciary Committee, and, at the request of the Chair, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL], the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, postponed calling up the resolution. And it was again postponed yesterday morning on the joint consent of both the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] and the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. The only change that has been made in the rights of the member representing the Committee on Military Affairs is that the House itself has the same privilege that he has—the privilege of bringing up the resolution if it is not reported.

Now, the gentleman from Iowa has brought in this resolution and moved to lay it on the table. Nothing has transpired that changes his right to make that motion; and there is nothing better settled in parliamentary law than that a motion to lay on the table is not debatable. The Chair also has no doubt that, under the usages of the House, the laying of the resolution on the table, like the postponing of it, is a consideration of the matter by the House. The Chair is, therefore, constrained to overrule the point of order and to hold that the motion made by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs is in order; and the question before the House is on that motion.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a request, if the Chair will entertain it, for unanimous consent. I desire to ask that the report of the committee and the views of the minority may both be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that the report of the majority of the committee, with the views of the minority, may be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order is made.

The report of the committee is as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred H. Res. 278, as follows:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of War is requested to furnish to the House, if not incompatible with the public interest, the following information: What salary or other compensation has been paid to Gen. Leonard A. Wood, late governor-general of Cuba, during the occupation of Cuba by the military forces of the United States, and by what authority and under what law such salary or compensation has been paid"— report the same back to the House with the recommendation that it do lie on the table.

House Doc. No. 696 of the first session of the Fifty-sixth Congress furnishes the information, together with a letter from the Secretary of War dated May 31, 1902, which states that the salary received as governor of Cuba was $15,000 per year for entire time.

Letter from Secretary of War is made part of this report:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington, May 31, 1902.

SIR: I observe that a resolution has been introduced in the House, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, calling for information as to General Wood's salary in Cuba and the authority under which it has been paid. I should hardly suppose that the adoption of the resolution would serve any useful purpose. You will find the whole subject covered in House Document No. 696, Fifty-sixth Congress, first session, on page 17, of which you will find the order of General Alger making an allowance to General Brooke, out of the revenues of Cuba, at the rate of $7,500 a year. There has been no change since that time, except that when General Wood's commission as major-general of volunteers expired I made an order for a further allowance, equal to the difference between the salary of a major-general and a brigadier-general, so as to keep his total compensation at the same figure, the combined compensation received as an officer of the Army and as governor of Cuba being always $15,000 per annum.

I see that the Cuban Congress has voted that Mr. Palma's salary shall be $25,000. You will see, by examining the document above referred to, that I have already explained this subject both to the Senate and to the House, and neither House of Congress has taken any action or made any objection, although the matter has thus been fully before them for two years, and although there has been important legislation regarding Cuba in the meantime. The payments of this salary are also explained in the full and detailed account of all expenditures of Cuban revenues down to the 30th of April, 1900, transmitted to the Committee of the Senate on Cuba, and contained in five large printed volumes containing a complete and detailed accounting in answer to the calls of that committee, made up at an expense of probably not less than $50,000. It is the purpose of the Department to transmit to Congress at an early day a further accounting, giving the receipts and expenditures in detail down to the close of our occupation, and 13 typewriters are now exclusively engaged in the preparation of this statement. Under these circumstances the passing of this resolution by the House would seem to have somewhat the character of giving the sanction of the House to an attack which is without the slightest foundation.

I should hardly suppose that the House of Representatives would wish to adopt a resolution which implies ignorance on its part of the authority of the President of the United States, under the law of military occupation, to appropriate and expend the revenues of the government of the occupied country. The concluding words of the resolution would seem to have that effect.

It seems hardly worth mentioning that neither the name nor the title of General Wood is correctly stated in the resolution.

Very respectfully,

ELIHU ROOT, Secretary of War.

Hon. JOHN A. T. HULL,
Chairman Committee on Military Affairs, House of Representatives.

The views of the minority are as follows:

The undersigned members of the Committee on Military Affairs respectfully dissent from the report of the committee on House resolution No. 278, which resolution is as follows:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of War is requested to furnish to the House, if not incompatible with the public interest, the following information: What salary or other compensation has been paid to Gen. Leonard A. Wood, late governor-general of Cuba, during the occupation of Cuba by the military forces of the United States, and by what authority and under what law such salary or compensation has been paid."

General Wood is an officer in the United States Army, with the rank of brigadier-general, and, as such officer, was governor-general of the island of Cuba, and in command of the military forces of the United States stationed in Cuba. His pay and emoluments of office were fixed by statute, as an officer of the United States Government. The pay of a brigadier-general of the Army is by statute fixed at $5,500 per annum, or $458.33 per month, and 10 per cent therefor for serving beyond the limits of the United States.

The statement has been made in the press that large sums have been paid to General Wood as salary and allowances during his service in Cuba—far in excess of the amount allowed by law for salary and allowances.

The purpose of this resolution was simply to arrive at the facts, and expressed no opinion as to the legality of the payment; and Congress is entitled to know the facts.

Section 1269 of the Revised Statutes, which is also contained in section 817 of the Military Laws of the United States, provides "that no allowance shall be made to officers in addition to their pay, except as hereinafter provided."

This is a statute expressly forbidding any other allowance to officers of the Army than that provided by law, and if it has been violated, or if additional allowances have been paid to General Wood, Congress is entitled to know what they are, and under what authority of law they have been paid.

There are various statutes upon the subject. Section 1763 of the Revised Statutes declares:

"No person who holds an office, the salary or annual compensation attached to which amounts to the sum of $2,500, shall receive compensation for discharging the duties of any other office, unless expressly authorized by law."

Section 1764 provides:

"No allowance or compensation shall be made to any officer or clerk, by reason of the discharge of duties which belong to any other officer or clerk in the same or any other department; and no allowance or compensation shall be made for any extra services whatever, which any officer or clerk may be required to perform, unless expressly authorized by law."

Section 1765 of the Revised Statutes provides:

"No officer in any branch of the public service, or any other person whose salary, pay, or emoluments are fixed by law or regulations, shall receive any additional pay, extra allowance, or compensation, in any form whatever, for the disbursement of public money, or for any other service or duty whatever, unless the same is authorized by law, and the appropriation therefor explicitly states that it is for such additional pay, extra allowance, or compensation."

We do not know what the facts are, and make no charge that this law and the sections quoted have been violated; but we do insist that Congress has the right to be informed of the facts; to know whether the law has been violated in the matter of allowing pay and compensation to this officer, in what manner the public money has been spent, and by what authority of law it has been spent. An answer to the resolution of inquiry, if the salary provided by law has been paid to General Wood, or if he has been given the salary and allowances authorized by law, could do no wrong or injustice to this officer; and if a salary and emoluments have been paid him which were not allowable by law, then Congress has the right to know it and to be informed of it. The defeat of this resolution would be both an injustice to General Wood and a denial of the right of the House to have at all times information from the heads of the departments of the Government.

We believe the resolution is a proper one and should be passed, and we so recommend.

WM. SULZER.
JAMES HAY.
JAMES L. SLAYDEN.
THOS. M. JETT.
C. E. SNODGRASS.

The SPEAKER. The question is now on the motion to lay on the table. [The question was put.] The ayes appear to have it.

Mr. HAY. I call for a division.

The question was again taken; and there were—ayes 77, noes 55.

Mr. HAY. Upon this question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 100, nays 71, answered "present" 24; not voting 156, as follows:

Mr. REEDER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state that I did not hear my name called. I was listening for it, but did not hear it.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in his seat and listening when his name was called?

Mr. REEDER. I was here and was aiming to listen to it, but I presume some one was standing in front of me, which prevented my hearing at the time it was called.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman listening?

Mr. REEDER. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the name of the gentleman.

Mr. REEDER'S name was called, and he voted "aye."

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Speaker, when my name was called I answered "present" on the first call, under the impression that my pair was not present. He is present, and I desire to vote "no."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the name of the gentleman.

Mr. WHEELER'S name was called, and he voted "no."

Mr. HILDEBRANT. Mr. Speaker, I find I am paired with Mr. MAYNARD of Virginia, and the gentleman is absent. I voted "aye" on the motion, and I desire to withdraw that vote and vote "present."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the name of the gentleman.

Mr. HILDEBRANT'S name was called, and he voted "present."

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, I was present, but failed to hear my name called.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in his seat and listening?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the name of the gentleman.

Mr. JOHNSON'S name was called, and he voted "no."

Mr. SPERRY. Mr. Speaker, I was in the committee room during the roll call, and if I have a vote I desire to vote "aye."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not vote.

Mr. BELLAMY. Mr. Speaker, I voted "no," and I find that I am paired. I wish to recall that vote and vote "present."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the name of the gentleman.

Mr. BELLAMY'S name was called, and he voted "present."

The Clerk announced the following pairs:

For the session:

Mr. SHERMAN with Mr. RUPPERT.

KATHERINE RAINS PAUL.

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Speaker, I have here a conference report on the bill (H. R. 11249) granting an increase of pension to Katherine Rains Paul, with the accompanying statement, reported from the Pension Committee, and I ask that the same be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The report and statement will be printed as requested.

The report and statement are as follows:

REPORT.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11249) granting an increase of pension to Katharine Rains Paul, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment.

H. C. LOUDENSLAGER,
J. H. BROMWELL,
WILLIAM RICHARDSON,
Managers on the part of the House.
J. H. GALLINGER,
J. C. PRITCHARD,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Statement to accompany report of committee of conference on disagreeing vote of the two Houses on bill H. R. 11249, granting an increase of pension to Katharine Rains Paul.

This bill originally passed the House at $40 per month, but was amended in the Senate to $50 per month. The result of the conference is that the Senate recedes from its amendment and agrees to the forty-dollar rating fixed by the House, and your conferees recommend that the bill pass at $40 per month, as it originally passed the House.

H. C. LOUDENSLAGER,
J. H. BROMWELL,
WILLIAM RICHARDSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

PROTECTION OF THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (S. 3653) for the protection of the President of the United States, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House, with Mr. GROSVENOR in the chair.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. BARTLETT.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, the discussion of this bill forcibly reminds me and I apprehend equally forcibly reminds the public of the truth of the saying of the great philosopher Montaigne, "that there is more ado about interpreting interpretations than about interpreting things"——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia will suspend till order is obtained in the committee.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, if this was something of my own that I had started to say I would not undertake to repeat it, but I have said that the discussion of this bill reminds me, and I venture the assertion that it has reminded the public, that the saying of the distinguished French philosopher Montaigne, uttered years ago, is as true to-day as it was true then, "that there is more ado to interpret interpretations than to inpret things, and more books upon books than upon all other subjects; that we do nothing but comment upon one another." The discussion by the members of the Judiciary Committee and by other members of the House has been to show that they have been engaged this week in interpreting interpretations, and that we have done little else other than to comment upon one another.

The bill came from the Senate in such shape and form, and was so undoubtedly a plain violation of the Constitution of the United States, that the distinguished chairman of the Judiciary Committee [Mr. RAY of New York], speaking for that great committee of the House, has laid down almost as an axiomatic proposition, as a matter beyond doubt, that the Senate bill was unconstitutional; and in order to give to the House and to Congress and to the country a bill which would not be unconstitutional the Judiciary Committee have presented to the House this substitute.

Now, I want to say for myself and for the people whom I represent and for the section of country from which I come that if there is one spot in this great Republic where doctrines of anarchy are neither taught nor tolerated it is the section of country from which I come and the South generally. I want to say that we have such a small percentage of foreign-born population that the red flag of anarchy has never been seen in the South, and I apprehend never will be seen there.

I do not mean to charge by this statement that anarchy is tolerated or approved in any other section of the country, but I mean that we have been so fortunate in our affairs that the doctrines of the anarchists have not found lodgment there, and I assert that the people whom I represent and the people of the South generally will approve of and uphold any legitimate, lawful, and constitutional legislation that will destroy anarchy in this country or that will keep from our borders every anarchist and every teacher of anarchy.

But much as we are opposed to anarchy, much as this whole nation were shocked at the untimely death and dastardly assassination of the late Chief Magistrate of this country; while we would keep from our shores all anarchists; while, so far as I am concerned, I am willing to go to the uttermost limit of the Constitution in the enactment of a law against the anarchists, there is no demand that the President of the United States, the Vice-President of the United States, those who would succeed to the presidency in case of a vacancy, and the foreign ambassadors to this country should be elevated to a higher plane before the law than any other men in the country.

The President of the United States, in his official capacity, in the discharge of his duty, represents this great Government; and I shall, if I have the opportunity, vote to enact such a law as will protect him from the knife or bullet of the assassin, or from any attempt to destroy him because he is the representative head of this Government, or because he undertakes to discharge his official duties, or because it may be charged that he omits to discharge his official duty.

I will go as far as any man in this House for the enactment of such a law as that; but I am unwilling to say that the Government shall invade the domain of the States and enact a law which shall give it the exclusive jurisdiction over such offenders, and I am unwilling to say that a man, simply because he is President of the United States, where an assault be made upon him not because of his official character or because of his doing of some official act or because of his omission to do some official act, shall, as a citizen of the United States, while resident or present in any one of the States of this Union, be any more entitled to protection under the laws of the land than the humblest citizen of the country.

I know full well that the Supreme Court have, in a number of cases, upheld the sections of the Federal statutes which protect officers of the law, marshals, revenue agents, and various others, including witnesses who have to attend the United States courts and prisoners in the custody of the officers of the United States; and they have upheld those sections because it is the duty of the Government to protect its officers while in the discharge of their duty. I repeat here that I am willing to go as far as any man, Democrat or Republican, in protecting the President of the United States as we protect the other officers of the Government in the discharge of their official duties, but there my power and duty under the Constitution ends.

I now desire to read from a case decided by Judge Jackson while presiding as a circuit judge of circuit court of the United States in the State of Tennessee, and which came up to the Supreme Court and was affirmed. This judge was afterwards a justice of the Supreme Court of the United States and died while filling that high office.

It is the case of The United States against Patrick, in volume 54 of the Federal Reporter. It is pertinent to the question whether the offense contained in the statutes of the United States, section 5508, was within the jurisdiction of the United States court, and he declares this to be the law:

An office is a public employment, and in the performance of its functions the citizen selected to represent the sovereign is in the exercise both of a private right or privilege and public duty, and a conspiracy to hinder, oppress, and injure him in the discharge of such functions can not be regarded as directed solely against the official in his representative character, but must be considered as those against a citizen exercising or enjoying the right or privilege of accepting public employment and engaging in the administration of its functions.

This was a case where a marshal of the United States in Tennessee had been assaulted and killed because he undertook to serve process, and we find sections 5508 and 5509 defining the crime, and then there are sections 5518 and 5520 which contain provisions of like character. In section 5518 I find a statute which I will read. The court has all along undertaken to protect its officer in the discharge of his duty from assault or being attempted to be killed or murdered in the discharge of such duty. Section 5518 reads as follows:

SEC. 5518. If two or more persons in any State or Territory conspire to prevent by force, intimidation, or threat any person from accepting or holding any office, trust, or place of confidence under the United States, or from discharging any duties thereof; or to induce by like means any officer of the United States to leave any State, district, or place where his duties as an officer are required to be performed, or to injure him in his person or property on account of his lawful discharge of the duties of his office, or while engaged in the lawful discharge thereof, or to injure his property so as to molest, interrupt, hinder, or impede him in the discharge of his official duties, each of such persons shall be punished by a fine of not less than $500 or more than $5,000, or by imprisonment, with or without hard labor, not less than six months nor more than six years, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

Section 5508 of the Revised Statutes of the United States provides:

If two or more persons shall conspire to injure, oppress, threaten, or intimidate any citizen in the free exercise or enjoyment of any right or privilege secured to him by the Constitution or laws of the United States, or because of his having so exercised the same—shall be subject to fine and imprisonment, etc.

Section 5509 provides that if in the act of violating any provision of the preceding section any other felony or misdemeanor be committed, the offender shall be punished for the same, with such punishment as is attached to such felony or misdemeanor by the laws of the State in which the offense is committed.

It really seems to me that these statutes are ample to protect the President and other officers of the Government, and if the penalties are made greater, that would meet the present demand and remain within the provisions of the Constitution.

We have placed these statutes upon the books, which protect the officer of the Government of the United States, and instead of enlarging these statutes by increasing the penalty, instead of providing that the President under like circumstances, if he shall be assaulted in a State or Territory or anywhere within the jurisdiction of the United States, that the assailant if death ensue shall suffer death, or if the assault does not succeed in accomplishing that he shall be punished as provided in this bill, it is proposed to enact into law the pending bill; and it has been said here in debate—the Senate undertook to enact a law to that effect—that if the President was assailed and killed, whether he was performing any duties at all or not, that the party should be punished as for murder or by death. To such a proposition I can not lend my assent or give my vote.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the Supreme Court of the United States, in discussing these statutes which I have read, and in discussing the right of the citizen, whether he be an officer or simply a citizen, entitled to the immunities and protection and the privileges of the law, have held repeatedly that the right to be protected in the enjoyment of life and property within the State belonged to the citizen of the State, and the duty to give such protection devolved upon the State, and not upon the United States Government.

And they have said, in so many words, that if Congress undertakes to go beyond this and undertakes to make acts crimes which are committed within the State, and does not confine the act to a violation of the rights of the officer of the United States as an official, while he is not discharging his duty simply, then that sort of a law would not be constitutional. Therefore I say I am glad the distinguished chairman of this committee, and the other members of it who have joined with him, boldly declare to the country that the Constitution of the United States is still a living instrument and restrains Congress from invading the domain of the States, even though public clamor may demand otherwise.

I am in favor of protecting the President of the United States from assassination or from any illegal or wanton assault that may be made against him as the head of the Government, because of the fact that he is the President and in discharge of his duty. I am glad the chairman of this committee and the members who followed him rose to the great height of declaring that a law of the country should be enacted in conformity with the Constitution.

The decision I have in my hand (United States v. Patrick, 54 Fed. Rep., 339) refers to the case of the United States against Cruikshank (93 U. S. Reports, p. 553), and Judge Jackson, in discussing this very question, says:

It was of these fundamental rights of life and liberty that the court said (in United States v. Cruikshank, 92 U. S., 553, 554): "Sovereignty, for this purpose, rests alone with the States. It is no more the duty or within the power of the United States to punish for a conspiracy to falsely imprison or murder within a State than it would be to punish for false imprisonment or murder itself."

And that doctrine has been upheld in the case of Logan v. The United States (144 U. S.).

As has been stated, these statutes have been upheld by the Supreme Court of the United States as constitutional, because the court has held that officers who are assaulted, injured, or killed under the circumstances named in the statute are exercising rights secured to them by the laws of the United States, and has upheld indictments as valid which alleged the killing of such officers, or the injuring of them, or the attempt to injure them while exercising such rights. The statutes have been uniformly upheld by the Supreme Court of the United States because of the fact that the person assaulted, injured, or interfered with was either an officer of the United States at the time in the discharge of the duties of such office, or was exercising some right or privilege secured to him by the Constitution or laws of the United States.

In the case of the United States v. Waddell (112 U. S., 76), they upheld the jurisdiction of the United States court to try a case in which the defendants were charged with the offense of conspiracy under the provisions of section 5508. The particular right which the citizen was alleged to have been exercising, and against which the conspiracy was alleged to have been formed, was that of remaining on the land which, under the laws of the United States, he had made a homestead entry, a sufficient length of time to entitle him to a patent therefor. The court held that this right being secured to him by the laws of the United States, a conspiracy against him in the enjoyment of this right comes within the provisions of section 5508.

In the case of New Orleans v. Abbagnato, (62 Federal Reporter, p. 25; same case, 23 U. S. Court-Appeals, 533); the court maintained the proposition that the preservation of the public peace devolves on the State, upholding the principle in the case in the 92 U. S. Reports, 553, that the duty of protecting its citizens in the enjoyment of equality of rights was originally assumed by the States and remains there.

The principle in the case in 92 United States Reports, 550, that the United States can neither grant nor secure for its citizens any rights or privileges not placed under its jurisdiction by the Constitution, is recognized in the case of Presser v. Illinois (116 U. S. Reports, 266). In this case, last cited, the court, in reaffirming the case of Cruikshanks, declares:

For, as was said by the court in Cruikshanks's case (92 U. S. Reports, 542), the Government of the United States, although it is, within the scope of its powers, supreme and above the State, can neither grant nor secure to its citizens any right or privilege not expressly granted, or by necessary implication placed under its jurisdiction. * * * All that can not be so granted or so secured are left to the exclusive protection of the States.

In Logan v. The United States (144 U. S., 263) the court upheld the right of the United States Government to prosecute for an assault upon a prisoner while in the custody of a United States marshal under a lawful commitment to be protected against a conspiracy to oppress, injure, or maltreat him, and they held that this was a right implied from the duty and obligation of the Government to protect a citizen while thus in its custody.

This right of a citizen in the custody of a United States marshal under a lawful commitment to answer for an offense against the United States, to be protected against lawless violence was held to be such a right or privilege secured by the Constitution and laws of the United States, as the said section 5508 of the Revised Statutes was intended to protect against a conspiracy to interfere with.

In that case it is expressly declared that said section is not limited to the political rights of citizens. So that it may be asserted that the United States court can not take jurisdiction of offenses committed wholly within the jurisdiction of a State unless the offense alleged is committed against a citizen to interfere with some right or privilege which is secured to him by the laws of the United States, or is an assault upon an officer because he is in the discharge of the duties of his office, and in that way represents the sovereign power of the United States.

Citations might be multiplied on this subject, but I feel sure that the principle is correctly stated. Therefore the House bill which changes the Senate bill proceeds along the only line upon which legislation is constitutional.

I do not believe that the provisions of the bill should be extended so as to include anyone else than the President of the United States, and possibly the Vice-President, or to make an assault upon their persons or the killing of them an offense within the jurisdiction of the United States when committed within the confines of any State. It would be proper on the lines I have undertaken to argue to make it applicable to such person as may be discharging the duties of the President, in case of a vacancy by the death or resignation of both the President and Vice-President; nor do I believe that the law should be extended to include the ambassadors or ministers of foreign countries.

Everyone understands that this bill is demanded in the shape that it is because the Constitution has limited and defined what acts shall constitute treason, and because the Constitution has prevented acts from being treason which would be considered as treason in a government whose powers are not limited in that regard as ours is. But even in England the acts which constitute treason have never been extended to include any other than those which are aimed at the King or his consort, or their eldest son and heir, for by 25 Edward III treason was defined to be "when a man doth compass or imagine the death of our lord the King, or our lady the Queen, or their eldest son and heir."

By this bill we propose virtually, in fact, to extend the law so as to punish as treason not only assaults upon the President and Vice-President, or the killing of such officers, but to every member of the Cabinet who might under certain circumstances succeed to the Presidency, and to foreign ambassadors.

I desire to discuss briefly the thirteenth section of the bill. Since it is conceded by the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary of the House, and by a large majority of its members, and since in this debate it has been insisted, I think with great force by able lawyers on the floor, and since the decision of the Supreme Court which I have quoted, and others which have been cited, the United States court can only secure jurisdiction of the offenses proposed to be declared and for which penalties are prescribed in the bill by reason of the fact that the acts are done and the crimes are committed against officers while in the discharge of their official duties, or because of the discharge of some official duties, or the failure to discharge some official duty, then the whole life of the statute depends upon the allegation and proof to be made on the trial of such case, that such act was committed because of the official character of the President, Vice-President, or other official, and to permit that most vital fact, and the very heart of the offense, to be presumed to exist without proof and to cast the burden upon the defendant to disprove it instead of placing it upon the prosecution, as in all criminal trials, as from time immemorial has been required of the prosecution to prove, would be to reverse one of the most ancient, time-honored, and well-established principles of criminal law, followed in every court and laid down for the protection of life and liberty. The humanity of the law provides that persons charged with crime are presumed to be innocent until they are proven by competent evidence to be guilty.

To the benefit of this presumption every defendant is entitled, and this presumption stands as their sufficient protection until and unless it has been removed by evidence proving the guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. And this presumption of innocence, and this requirement that the proof shall be beyond a reasonable doubt, applies to every essential ingredient of a crime. This last proposition has become axiomatic in the administration of criminal law. How unusual, how foreign to every conception of criminal procedure, would be this provision which permits that the very essence of the crime should not be proven, but should be presumed to be established! This provision is not like a presumption of law, but it is a presumption of fact, which the prosecution declares to exist as a fact sufficient to authorize the jury to convict, and the judge to sentence to death, when the jury so finds upon that presumption.

It is in no way similar to the presumption of law that malice shall be inferred where an unlawful killing has been proven and the attending circumstances do not demonstrate or show facts from which the crime may be reduced, justified, or excused. The taking of human life is unlawful. Therefore the law says that when it has been shown to the satisfaction of a jury that the defendant on trial for murder has taken life, as alleged in the indictment, the law presumes that he did it with malice aforethought, and therefore the crime is murder, and it devolves upon the defendant to prove that it is some lesser grade of homicide or that he was justified.

How different here in this section? The United States court would not have jurisdiction unless it should appear that the party accused and on trial committed the acts alleged against President or Vice-President or the other officials named in the bill, because of the fact of their official character, or because of the fact that they had done something in their official capacity, or omitted to do something in their official capacity. If it should appear at any time in the trial, either from the evidence of the prosecution or of the defense, that the accused did not do so, but that he was actuated for other reasons, and that the acts alleged to be done were not done on account of the official character of the person assaulted or killed, or on account of some official act, then the court would be compelled to direct an acquittal, because the United States court, under the Constitution, would have no jurisdiction to try such a case.

Therefore, to presume the very essence of this crime, so far as the United States court and its jurisdiction is concerned, would permit the mere reading of the indictment and proof of the act to give jurisdiction of the offense to the United States court. It would be, in fact, starting the trial with the presumption that the defendant was guilty of an offense against the United States, when all the humanity of the law and the theory of the law and the principles of the law have for centuries required that the presumption in criminal cases should be that the defendant is innocent of any crime or of any necessary ingredient of the crime for which he is being tried.

The text-books state it as unquestioned that the principle that there is a presumption of innocence in favor of the accused is the undoubted law, axiomatic and elementary, and that its enforcement lies at the foundation of the administration of our criminal law. This principle just stated has been referred to as a matter of course in the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States and in the courts of the several States of the Union. I refer to some of them:

Taylor on Evidence, Vol. I, chap. 5, 26–27.
Best on Presumption, part 2, Chap. I, 63–64.
Greenleaf on Evidence, part 5, sec. 29.
Wharton on Evidence, sec. 1244.
Lillienthal v. United States, 96 U. S., 237.
Hopt v. Utah, 120 U. S., 430.
The Commonwealth v. Webster, 5 Cushing, 295.
And authorities might be multiplied ad infinitum.

Greenleaf traces this presumption to Deuteronomy, and says that it was substantially embodied in the laws of Sparta and Athens. Whether this be correct or not, it is true that the Roman law laid down this maxim of criminal administration, as the following extracts from the Roman law will show:

Let all accusers understand that they are not to prefer charges unless they can be proven by proper witnesses or by conclusive documents, or by circumstantial evidence which amounts to indubitable proof and is clearer than day. (Code LIV, T. xx, 1, l. 25.)

The noble (divus) Trajan wrote to Julius Frontonus that no man should be condemned on a criminal charge in his absence, because it was better to let the crime of a guilty person go unpunished than to condemn the innocent. (Dig. XLVIII, Tit. 19, l. 5.)

In all cases of doubt the most merciful construction of facts should be preferred. (Dig. L. L., Tit. XVII, l. 56.)

In criminal cases the milder construction shall always be preserved. (Dig. L. L., Tit. XVII, l. 192, s. 1.)

It is related of the Emperor Julian that Numerius, governor of Narbonensis, was on trial before the Emperor and that the trial was public. The defendant contented himself with denying his guilt, and there was not sufficient proof against him. His adversary, seeing from the failure of the proof that an acquittal was inevitable, could not restrain himself, and exclaimed, "Oh, illustrious Cæsar! If it is sufficient to deny, what hereafter will become of the guilty?" To which Julian replied: "If it suffices to accuse, what will become of the innocent?"

And this rule of the Roman law, together with other fundamental and humane maxims found in that system, has been preserved in the canon law; and the practice of these principles in the trial of criminals has existed in the common law from the earliest times.

We find the following in the writings of Fortescue:

Who, then, in England can be put to death unjustly for any crime, since he is allowed so many pleas and privileges in favor of life? None but his neighbors, men of honest and good repute, against whom he can have no probable cause of exception, can find the person accused guilty. Indeed, one would much rather that twenty guilty persons should escape the punishment of death than one innocent person should be condemned and suffer capitally.

Lord Hale, in 1678, in 2 Hale's Pleas of the Crown, page 290, says:

In some cases presumptive evidence goes far to prove a person guilty, though there be no express proof of the fact to be committed by him, but then it must be very warily pressed, for it is better five guilty persons should escape unpunished than one innocent person should die.

So we find in Blackstone, second book, chapter 2, page 358:

The law holds that it is better that ten guilty persons escape than that one innocent suffer.

In the case of McKinley, tried in 1817, 33 St. Tr., 275, 506, Lord Gillies says:

It is impossible to look at it (a treasonable oath, which it was alleged that McKinley had taken) without suspecting and thinking it probable it imports an obligation to commit a capital crime. That has been and is my impression. But the presumption in favor of innocence is not to be reargued by mere suspicion. I am sorry to see in this information that the public prosecutor treats this too lightly. He seems to think that the law entertains no such presumption of innocence. I can not listen to this. I can see that this presumption is to be found in every code of law which has reason and religion and humanity for a foundation. It is a maxim which ought to be inscribed in indelible characters in the heart of every judge and juryman.

And he goes on to say that to overturn this presumption there must be legal evidence of guilt, carrying home a degree of conviction short only of absolute certainty.

Recalling the words of this judge, uttered nearly a century ago. I ask that this House remember this maxim of the law, so ancient, so venerable, so safe, and so wise, which has its foundation upon reason and religion and humanity; which ought to be inscribed, in the language of this English Lord and judge, in indelible characters in the heart of every judge and juryman, and it should be inscribed in the heart of every law maker, especially the law makers of the greatest Republic on earth.

And I appeal to you to be slow to enact a law which reverses this humanity of the law—this wise principle of the law—which has been revered by the wisest sages and judges of all ages and climes and handed down as one of the inalienable rights of the citizen, and that we shall do no act, even in our desire to punish the assassination of or assaults upon our Chief Magistrate, which will destroy this great principle of law in the administration of criminal justice, and thus put ourselves out of harmony with all the humane nations of the earth in the administration of our criminal statutes.

Let it be said of the law now, as it was said by the great Englishman, Hooker, who lived in the fifteenth century:

Of law there can be no less acknowledged than that her seat is the bosom of God, her voice the harmony of the world. All things in heaven and earth do her homage—the very least as feeling her care, and the greatest as not exempted from her power.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. RAY of New York. That has already been granted.

Mr. BARTLETT. The extension is for five days. I ask that the Chair put my request to extend my remarks in the RECORD, which will give me a greater time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the time having been settled by the House, the Committee of the Whole can not extend that time. The gentleman can make his request for extension in the House.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the supposed necessity for the measure now pending arises from the assassination of President McKinley, and the universal feeling of horror which swept over the entire country, demanding preventive and suppressive legislation against anarchy and anarchists.

The recent address of Mr. Secretary Hay, commemorative of the life and character of William McKinley, was delivered in this Chamber before an inspiring audience, embracing, as it did, a notable assemblage of citizens, the ambassadors and ministers of foreign countries, the executive chiefs of all the departments of the Republic, the Senators of sovereign States, and the Representatives of the American people.

On the passage of the resolution to return a vote of thanks to the distinguished eulogist of the lamented President I had the pleasure of casting my vote in the affirmative. In doing so I wished it to stand as an expression of appreciation of a most masterly address, couched in pure and vigorous English, and which, I think, is a distinct contribution to the best in our literature.

Indeed, I am not quite sure that there is anything finer of a similar character in the language than the portrayal of the early life and environment of William McKinley, and the character of the stock from which he sprung, that sturdy, virtuous, and independent middle class, from which has come the best we have in the arts of peace and war, and on whom is the surest and chiefest reliance of a representative republic.

In thus casting my vote I believed I was recording the will of the people whose representative I am, and whose honored guest the President was in the spring before his death, and that it was an expression of their regard for that true and upright man—the President of all our country, from whose lips nothing but kind words had ever fallen, and in whose gentle heart nothing but kind thoughts had ever abided.

The feeling of sorrow pervaded all classes, and was human, personal, and universal.

The wonder and pity of it was that any man in all the world could have been found willing to take the life of this kind, good man.

Joined with this was a deep, fierce, and just resentment against those enemies of organized society who advocate murder as a means of redress for wrongs, and in secret and at night hatch in their disordered brains foul plots of assassination.

So deep was this feeling that if at the time anyone should have been heard to rejoice at the death of the President or approve the dastardly deed by which he was taken off he would have been the object of bitter hatred and his life would scarcely have been safe.

To the honor and eternal pride of the whole South, chastened as she has been by great sorrows, but still struggling on through the shadows to the light; misrepresented, as she often has been; calumniated, as she sometimes is by the conscienceless partisan, there was not in all her borders such a man to be found or marked for her displeasure.

Indeed, in this part of your country, Mr. Chairman, the anarchist has never been bred, and throughout its length and breadth a President of the United States can "scatheless walk," just as a woman could in England in Alfred's day.

What is called anarchy is the child of despair and discontent, born of Old World absolutism, where hereditary titles—not culture and accomplishment—are the badges of nobility, and where distinctions of class have withered the hopes of man and held him down with weights which he can not lift.

Discontent, in the large sense which implies hatred of government and those charged with executive duty, finds its beginning in special privileges accorded the few, in artificial distinctions of class, whether they be hereditary or the result of unequal laws, and has its consummation in blind and unreasoning destruction.

It may be doubted whether the type of anarchists such as has been found in European countries—willing to bring general ruin as a cure for present evils—has ever been produced in this country in any considerable number, and where such a one has been found he has been subject to the influence and association of persons who have brought their perverted theories from across the seas to impregnate with their malign doctrines weak and disordered minds.

The assassin of President McKinley was of this perverted class, and while it was not clear—or at least not proven after a careful investigation—that his assassination was the result of a conspiracy, yet it is equally certain that he had become the instrument of vengeance as a result of disordered conception and stirred to bloody deeds by alien teachings which he had heard and read.

There may be a reason, but not an excuse, for the existence of anarchy in the Old World, but there is neither reason nor excuse for its existence in this country.

While we have abuses and laws not always just—many of them quite otherwise—both unfair, vexatious, and burdensome, still we have the forum of free discussion and lawful criticism and hold within our keeping in popular and free suffrage and equal representation the right of modification and redress.

Anarchy can never flourish in this country except as an exotic so long as we preserve the freedom of the press and of speech and government rests upon the consent of the governed, freely expressed. It may become a home product if we fetter free speech and divide by law our people into classes and surround our high officials with new and strange prerogatives of royalty.

If it were possible to-day to wipe out anarchy and her foul brood once and forever from American soil, I should willingly cast my vote to this end, for the anarchist is a universal murderer and anarchy means universal ruin.

But in attempting to legislate against anarchy we may accomplish all that laws can accomplish without straining the timbers of the Constitution, interfering with the rights of the States, or overturning the wise and approved precedents of centuries.

The bill under consideration proposes not to deal with anarchy alone, but with the killing of Presidents and other officers by anyone, whether anarchist or not, prescribing penalties which must follow, and conferring jurisdiction upon the Federal courts.

It is regrettable that the Judiciary Committee of the House has not seen fit to present separate bills covering both subjects, so that those who are in favor of suppressive legislation against anarchy might so record their votes and not be required at the same time to approve certain other provisions of the bill to which they unqualifiedly dissent.

Whether there was or not a purpose to embrace a wide variety of subjects in one bill—some good, others bad—with the belief that the general sentiment in favor of legislation on anarchy would be sufficiently strong to carry the bad with the good, I do not know, but the fact remains that we can not vote for parts of the bill without voting for all it contains, and those of us who believe in preserving the jurisdiction of the States in powers not yielded to the Federal Government, and that no discrimination in class shall be made by law, are forced to the position where our opinions can not be freely expressed on all the subjects embraced in the proposed legislation.

There are many members on this floor, and I believe they are in the majority, who will vote for the bill as a whole under the compulsion forced by the committee, fearing a misconstruction of their motives if they should cast a vote in the negative.

As for myself, I am unwilling to be driven to a position that neither my conception of right nor public duty will approve and surrender my convictions on vital principles of government.

The reasons which impel me to this course will be given as I proceed with the discussion of the bill.

It contains 13 sections, and all of those relating to unlawful conspiracies or other acts by which violence is counseled against officials—either in this or in foreign countries—as well as those to prevent the coming of anarchists to this country, I approve without reserve, and therefore need not specifically refer to them.

The particular features of the bill to which I object are as follows:

SECTION 1. That any person who unlawfully, purposely, and knowingly kills the President of the United States while he is engaged in the performance of his official duties, or because of his official character, or because of any of his official acts or omissions, shall suffer death.

SEC. 2. That any person who unlawfully, purposely, and knowingly kills the Vice-President of the United States, or any officer of the United States entitled by law to succeed to the Presidency, while he is engaged in the performance of his official duties, or because of his official character, or because of any of his official acts or omissions, shall suffer death.

SEC. 3. That any person who unlawfully, purposely, and knowingly kills any ambassador or minister of a foreign State or country accredited to the United States, and being therein, and while engaged in the performance of his official duties, or because of his official character, or because of any of his official acts or omissions, shall suffer death.

* * * * * * *

SEC. 13. That in all prosecutions under the provisions of the first seven sections of this act it shall be presumed, until the contrary is proved, that the President of the United States, or the Vice-President of the United States, or other officer of the United States entitled by law to succeed to the Presidency, as the case may be, was, at the time of the commission of the alleged offense, engaged in the performance of his official duties. Nothing in this act contained shall be construed as an admission or declaration that there is a time when either of such officers, during the tenure of his office, is not engaged in the performance of his official duties.

JURISDICTION AND POWERS OF STATE GRANTED TO FEDERAL GOVERNMENT.

My first objection is that the jurisdiction of the States is usurped by the Federal Government in rights which are inherent and in powers not yielded to the General Government.

Under our system of government there is a jurisdiction or sovereignty of the State and a jurisdiction or sovereignty of the General Government. Each is supreme within its own sphere, and neither, if the just balance of powers is to be preserved, can encroach upon the rights and the powers of the other.

Within its borders the rule is that the State is a sovereign, subject only to the Federal Constitution, and that in territory belonging to the Federal Government its power is supreme with the same qualification.

Over crimes committed in harbors, in Territories, in the District of Columbia, and, in short, on all property belonging to the United States this jurisdiction is complete and exclusive.

Over crimes committed in the States against State laws their jurisdiction is also exclusive, subject only to the qualification that the offense is not also directed against the General Government.

To illustrate, the crime of murder committed in a State, and other offenses against its laws, are punishable by the law of the State, while if they occur in territory owned by the Government its laws would punish the crime.

A citizen of a State, however, owes a double allegiance and is subject to two sovereignties. Thus, if he counterfeits a coin, he offends against both; for it is a fraud against the State, but primarily against the Government which stamps and emits the coin.

In United States v. Cruikshank (92 U. S., 542–554) the court enunciates these propositions, refering to the Federal Government:

The government thus established and defined is to some extent a government of the States in their political capacity. It is also, for certain purposes, a government of the people. Its powers are limited in number, but not in degree. Within the scope of its powers, as enumerated and defined, it is supreme and above the States, but beyond it has no existence. It was erected for special purposes and endowed with all the powers necessary for its own preservation and the accomplishment of the ends its people had in view. It can neither grant nor secure to its citizens any right or privilege not expressly or by implication placed under its jurisdiction.

The government thus established and defined is to some extent a government of the States in their political capacity. It is also, for certain purposes, a government of the people. Its powers are limited in number, but not in degree. Within the scope of its powers, as enumerated and defined, it is supreme and above the States, but beyond it has no existence. It was erected for special purposes and endowed with all the powers necessary for its own preservation and the accomplishment of the ends its people had in view. It can neither grant nor secure to its citizens any right or privilege not expressly or by implication placed under its jurisdiction.

The people of the United States resident within any State are subject to two governments, one State and the other national, but there need be no conflict between the two. The powers which one possesses the other does not. They are established for different purposes and have separate jurisdictions. Together they make one whole, and furnish the people of the United States with a complete Government, ample for the protection of all their rights at home and abroad.

True, it may sometimes happen that a person is amenable to both jurisdictions for one and the same act. Thus, if a marshal of the United States is unlawfully resisted while executing the process of the courts within a State, and the resistance is accompanied by an assault on the officer, the sovereignty of the United States is violated by the resistance, and that of the State by the breach of the peace in the assault. So, too, if one passes counterfeit coin of the United States within a State, it may be an offense against the United States and the State; the United States because it discredits the coin, and the State because of the fraud upon him to whom it is passed. This does not, however, necessarily imply that the two governments possess powers in common, or bring them into conflict with each other. It is the natural consequence of a citizenship which owes allegiance to two sovereignties and claims protection from both. The citizen can not complain, because he has voluntarily submitted himself to such a form of government. He owes allegiance to the two departments, so to speak, and within their respective spheres must pay the penalties which each exacts for disobedience to its laws. In return, he can demand protection from each within its own jurisdiction.

In the case above cited the following language occurs:

The very highest duty of the States when they entered into the Union under the Constitution was to protect all persons within their boundaries in the enjoyment of these "unalienable rights with which they were endowed by their Creator." Sovereignty for this purpose rests alone with the States. It is no more the duty or within the power of the United States to punish for a conspiracy to falsely imprison or murder within a State than it would be to punish for false imprisonment or murder itself.

In the Neagle case (135 U. S.), when a United States marshal shot and killed Terry for assaulting Mr. Justice Field in the dining room of a railway station in California, and for also making a hostile demonstration against himself when he attempted to prevent a continuation of the assault, the court held that at the time Justice Field was in the performance of his official duties, though at table, as he had just returned from holding court and was then proceeding on his way to another court, in session; and held, under the circumstances, that the United States court had jurisdiction as for an offense against the Federal Government.

Chief Justice Fuller and Mr. Justice Lamar dissented from the conclusions of the majority. There would have been no jurisdiction, confessedly, on the part of the Government had not Mr. Justice Field been engaged at the time in the discharge of his official duties, and had the homicide occurred at a time when he was not so engaged the jurisdiction of the State of California would have been exclusive.

The committee, in its report on the pending bill, recognizes this, and so when sections 1, 2, and 3 were framed it was designed to enact legislation to accord with the majority opinion in the Neagle case, the correctness of which many eminent lawyers have doubted and still doubt, and to declare against the killing of the President, the Vice-President, or any officer in the line of Presidential succession, or foreign ministers and ambassadors while in the performance of their official duties; and section 13 was prepared so that the presumption would be that there was never a time when such officials—excepting only foreign ministers and ambassadors—were not engaged in the performance of official duties.

So far as the status of the President is concerned, I am inclined to agree with the opinion expressed by some, that there is never a time when he is not, in a sense, engaged in the performance of official duty, though whether in the sense that would give the Federal court jurisdiction if he were killed under any and all circumstances may well be doubted.

As the executive head of the nation the duties of the President are of a continuous character during his tenure of office, and he is the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. It would be certain, however, that if the President himself should commit a felony in a State, his official character would not exempt him from punishment under State laws. It will be seen that the qualifying word "official" runs through all the enumerations of the sections quoted, and without this, if I understand the report of the chairman of the committee, he is of the opinion that the proposed law would be unconstitutional.

But it can never be said by anyone—and no one has said it—that the Vice-President or Cabinet officers or foreign ambassadors or ministers are always engaged in the performance of official duties.

The sole duty of the Vice-President is to preside over the deliberations of the Senate, and when that body adjourns his duty ceases and begins again on its reassembling.

Cabinet officers, who are appointees of the President at will and not constitutional officers, can not be said in any sense to be always so engaged; and as for ambassadors and ministers, they owe no allegiance to this Government and their official duties pertain to their own sovereign and in no way relate to any duty to the Federal Government, save as imposed by custom, international law, or the direction of their sovereign.

Then, under the conditions of this bill, how is the word "official," as applied to character, acts, duties, and omissions of the officers enumerated in the sections above quoted to be determined?

To meet this emergency and to confer the jurisdiction upon the Federal courts, section 13 of this remarkable bill was provided, creating the presumption in favor of the officer that he was engaged at the time in the performance of official duty, without any preliminary inquiry at all on habeas corpus, as was resorted to in the Naegle case, to determine the fact as a necessary one before Federal jurisdiction was assumed. So that in this section, save as to ambassadors and ministers, it is presumed until the contrary is proven, and then, in order to make the jurisdiction secure, this legal incongruity and absurdity follows: "Nothing in this act shall be construed as an admission or declaration that there is a time when either of such officers during the tenure of his office is not engaged in the performance of his official duties."

The distinguished members of the Judiciary Committee who framed this bill have been caught and involved in the net of their own ingenuity.

The question recurs: How and when is the extent of jurisdiction to be determined?

When the crime occurs, if the prisoner is held by the State and its jurisdiction is assumed and the Federal courts claim the jurisdiction, a conflict at once occurs, the result being that the Federal power will control the person of the prisoner at the end of contempt proceedings or after the exercise of superior power, and the jurisdiction of the State will be completely ousted.

When this has been done and the Federal court shall assume the jurisdiction, how then shall the question be determined whether the official at the time was in the performance of his official duties?

Following the practice, if a plea to the jurisdiction is interposed and the prisoner should claim that the officer killed was not in the discharge of his official duty, the presumption will be that he was, and this presumption is further made practically indisputable as a matter of fact, for nothing in the provision is to be taken as an admission that at any time the officers named are not in the discharge of their official duties.

The result is that the right of the prisoner is gone to be tried in the jurisdiction where the crime was committed, and the State is left powerless to support its own dignity and to acquit or convict the prisoner as the facts may appear to deserve. So that no matter under what circumstances the homicide may have occurred, whether the result of a mere personal quarrel or not, disassociated entirely from all official character, acts, or duties, it will be presumed to have been committed for one or all of these reasons, and this presumption the prisoner must overcome, with the trial as matter of law in the part of section 13 above quoted, that the presumption can be overcome.

In the case of the President, who may for some purposes be treated from an impersonal standpoint, there may be some show of reason for a presumption of this character, though not to be admitted at all times; but in the case of the Vice-President and Cabinet officers, who mingle freely with the people and have personal business relations which bring them into daily contact with their fellow-citizens when not actually engaged in the performance of official duties, such a presumption is not only absurd to a degree, but wrong from every legal and moral standpoint.

In such cases, at least, the authority of the State should be left supreme with the presumption in favor of the innocence of the accused, which is the humanity and the reason of the law.

To enact against this presumption of innocence and to presume guilt before it is proven is a strange graft upon the stock of the common law as well as shocking to our conception of human rights.

Thus not only are the sacred rights of the citizen invaded, but the authority and reserved right of the State to preserve its own sovereignty, to punish the guilty and acquit the innocent, is usurped by the Federal Government, that great and grasping power which is all too ready to absorb the rights of both citizen and State, becoming stronger day by day with what it feeds upon.

If a State should pass a law conferring jurisdiction for the killing of a governor or any other State official on territory belonging to the United States Government, upon the ground that the killing was a blow aimed at the State, such an act would hardly receive serious consideration; and yet the principle of both is the same. If delay, dilatory pleading, and conflicting jurisdiction, by which a trial for the murder of an official may be prolonged, is a desirable thing, then this bill furnishes all the means of vexation and delay and defeats its very purpose.

NO NECESSITY TO CONFER THIS JURISDICTION ON THE FEDERAL COURT.

I believe the bill is unconstitutional, but if it is not there is no necessity, either real or apparent, to take away from the States this jurisdiction and confer it upon the General Government.

A reason might exist if each sovereign State did not have ample laws, coupled with extreme penalties, against murder in every form, whether the person killed is a private citizen or an officer of the State or nation.

For one, I am unwilling to concede that there is a State in the American Union which would not or could not deal swift and condign punishment to the murderer of a President.

Why, then, is this invasion of the sovereign powers of States thought to be necessary, and what is the justification?

What seemed to be in the mind of the committee, judging from the report of the chairman, was that the punishment was not uniform, though it is not to be doubted that the States would do their full duty in punishing crimes of this character, and, indeed, this is admitted by the chairman of the committee in his speech before the House.

In every State in the Union, with possibly two exceptions, murder is punishable by death, and life imprisonment is substituted in the exceptions.

When the State has taken the life the law can go no further; the penalty is paid to the uttermost; and there are many who think that imprisonment for life in solitary confinement is a punishment exceeding that of death itself.

I do not think it can be assumed that the punishment for the crime mentioned will be more certain in one jurisdiction than the other. If past history on this subject shall be a criterion, and the presumption will be resolved in favor of the State courts.

A comparison of the crimes and trials of Guiteau, the assassin of President Garfield, and Czolgosz, the assassin of President McKinley, are instructive.

President Garfield was shot in the District of Columbia, and therefore the United States Government had exclusive jurisdiction. President McKinley was shot at Buffalo, N. Y., and therefore the State of New York had exclusive jurisdiction, the Governmentnot participating or being in any way represented at the trial.

Garfield was shot July 2, 1881; died September 19, 1881.

The trial of Guiteau began November 14, 1881; verdict rendered January 25, 1882, and he was hanged on June 30, 1882.

McKinley was shot September 6, 1901; died September 14, 1901.

The trial of Czolgosz begun September 13, 1901; verdict returned September 24, 1901; sentenced September 26, 1901, and he was electrocuted October 29, 1901.

The State court tried and convicted the assassin of McKinley in two days, while the Federal court in the District of Columbia required nearly two and one-half months to accomplish a similar result with the assassin of Garfield.

It required but a month and five days to execute Czolgosz after his conviction in the State court, and five days less than five months for the execution of Guiteau.

The proceedings in the State court were dignified and orderly, while those in the Federal court at Guiteau's trial were almost a reproach.

I do not mean that under the circumstances the comparison here instituted would necessarily be in favor of the State court, and it is only instituted to show that no presumption either way can legitimately be indulged in.

In my opinion the spectacle afforded by the great State of New York in the trial of the assassin of President McKinley in its own court, conducted by its own officers without Federal intervention of any sort, testifies alike to the wisdom and justice of State sovereignty, as well as to the universal condemnation of the foul deed of the assassin, and the ability of the State to deal swift justice.

What the State of New York so well did I believe every other State in the American Union would do, and to take away from the State the duty and patriotic privilege of punishing the murderer of a President is neither necessary nor wise.

OBJECTIONS TO THE QUALIFYING TERMS DESCRIBING THE OFFENSES AND THE BROAD SCOPE OF THE LAW.

What the people have demanded is legislation against anarchy, and not the creation of new offenses and jurisdictions.

Let the qualifying words in sections 1, 2, and 3 be observed, and the question will at once recur, Why were they used instead of the descriptive terms of the common law which have been sanctioned by "precedent unto precedent?"

The words "unlawfully, purposely, and knowingly," as used in the bill, are incomplete to describe a capital offense, and are neither apt nor scientific.

At common law malice aforethought, either express or implied, has always been held necessary to constitute the capital offense of murder, and it is believed that it will be found in all State statutes, or words of equivalent import.

This essential ingredient should have been retained, and in this respect the Senate bill, for which the measure under consideration was substituted, is preferable.

The only word, as used in the three sections quoted above, which would make the killing of the officers named an indictable offense at common law is the term "unlawful." If an indictment should be forced using the words "purposely and knowingly" alone to charge a defendant with either murder or manslaughter, it would be quashed on motion, and judgment or conviction would be arrested, for no verdict would be permitted to stand under the circumstances.

Coupled with the words "purposely and knowingly," if the other word "unlawfully" were used in an indictment for murder, it would still be faulty pleading and not correctly describe the capital offense at common law.

The correct words of description, which have a fixed and definite meaning, are discarded for the uncertain and indefinite words of the bill. The word "unlawful" is not convertible and is not the equivalent of "malice aforethought."

To illustrate the effect of these criticisms: A man may kill another both purposely and knowingly and not be guilty of any crime, for his act may be excusable, as where a sheriff hangs under the mandate of the law or a man takes the life of another in his lawful and necessary self-defense.

The word "unlawfully," too, admits of degrees and varies with circumstances. A man may unlawfully kill another and still not be guilty of a capital offense. The other circumstances connected with the homicide may greatly mitigate the offense, and where the act may be unlawful, yet it would not justify the severest punishment.

A premeditated, willful, and deliberate homicide is unlawful; so is one committed in the heat of passion produced by adequate provocation, and yet it would be a monstrous and bloody law which would not observe the distinction and which would prescribe the same measure of punishment for both offenses.

It is true the common law is not adopted by the Federal court except as it is adopted by statute, yet the Federal courts do look for and find their analogies and reasons in the common law, and in every case of murder in their jurisdiction have charged the jury on the ingredients of the common law necessary to constitute the crime.

If one citizen should kill another, not an official named in the bill, unlawfully, but without malice or deliberation, no matter how valuable the life of the citizen may be to his family or society, the homicide would not amount to murder; yet if he should kill under the same circumstances one of the excepted class he must suffer the extreme penalty, if the courts do not give a more humane construction to the provisions of this bill than has been given by the terms employed.

Can such a law and such distinctions meet with patience and toleration in a Republic of equal laws? If it can be justified in the case of the President, upon whose life so much of the welfare of society and even government itself depends, can it be further justified in the case of the Vice-President?

But the class has been extended to limits far beyond these important and constitutional officers. It embraces Cabinet officials who may succeed to the Presidency in case of the death of the President and Vice-President and to foreign ambassadors and ministers accredited by other countries to the United States Government.

In the case of Cabinet officers, the reason assigned is that they are in line of Presidential succession, which it is intended to preserve by this bill; and in the case of foreign ambassadors and ministers, that diplomatic reasons have controlled.

The alleged justification is as absurd as it is unnecessary.

Seven Cabinet officers are in line with the succession to the Presidency, in the following order: Secretary of State, Secretary of the Treasury, Secretary of War, Attorney-General, Postmaster-General, Secretary of the Navy, and Secretary of the Interior.

In ordinary times the succession of even the first named would be too remote to require special legislation for his protection, and at no time can it scarcely be conceived how any sort of condition would prevail that would justify this character of legislation in in favor of the other Cabinet officers.

Indeed, unless there was a simultaneous killing of the President, Vice-President, and Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury would never be in line of succession, because if only the President and Vice-President were killed at the same time the Secretary of State would become President and would fill his Cabinet by appointing a new Secretary of State, who would be in line of succession before any of the other Cabinet officers named, and the remoteness of the probability of the other Cabinet officers in line with the Presidential succession ever becoming, under any circumstances, the President of the United States by reason of the death or disability of those who precede them in official rank may be determined by those who will take the time to reason out the remote possibilities.

And why should the ambassador or foreign minister be placed upon a different or higher plane than our own citizens when they come as the accredited agents of other governments? They are entitled to the full protection of our laws and no more. To enact otherwise is a species of ostentatious and unnecessary legislation which must be distasteful to the American who has been taught to believe in the equality of human rights and to deny the monarchical distinction of class.

But these are not all the legitimate criticisms of this pernicious bill.

In what sense shall the word "knowingly" as used in the three sections quoted be taken? As referable to the mental condition of the assailant or to the fact of knowledge on his part that he was killing one of the officials named.

At common law it is not necessary for the person committing the homicide to know the person whom he kills, and the descriptive words employed refer to the mental status of the assailant, and by this analogy the same rule would here apply to the word "knowingly."

The chairman of the committee takes this view of the proper construction of the word "knowingly;" and since a part of these remarks were delivered on the floor of the House, an amendment was voted down which provided that before a person should be convicted under the provisions of this bill he should know the official character of the person killed.

So we have the admission of the chairman of the committee, as well as a legislative declaration, that it is not essential that the official character of the officer killed should have been known, and if this bill be constitutional, and the courts should construe the legislative intent as the lawmaking body has construed it, a President and the other officials are always engaged in the performance of official duty, and it will be made a capital offense to kill either of them, though no deliberation or malice appears and where the slayer is ignorant of the official character of the person slain.

I shall be mistaken if public opinion will endure this drastic and Draconian measure, masquerading as it does in the livery of social order, which confuses the jurisdiction of the courts and aims a blow at the reserved powers of sovereign States not less deadly than the one aimed at the dearest rights of the American citizen.

IS THE SERVANT GREATER THAN HIS MASTER?

The effect of some legislation has been to favor certain classes of our people, but this is the first time in the history of our Government that we have ever created a distinction by law or attempted to separate the official from the body of the people.

It is the first time we have ever declared that the man clothed with authority by the people shall stand apart from them in another atmosphere, upon a higher plane, and be subject to different laws.

It marks a new era and shakes the ancient pillars of the Republic.

My own respect for the office of President of the United States is exalted, and so is that of the American people, and I have no objection to all proper and necessary safeguards to protect the life of the individual who occupies that high station.

But I do protest against the declaration that the President, the Vice-President and Cabinet officers in the line of succession, and foreign ambassadors and ministers are to be put into an inner circle and surrounded with more than regal safeguards.

Even in monarchical England it was held "no treason to kill the king when he was not in the possession of government or acting as king."

Likewise, it was not treason to kill the officers of the king unless "being in their places and doing their offices."

Before the law the stature of all citizens of the Republic is equal, and if a "cubit be added" to one and not to all it is the beginning of the end to free and equal government, and our grand experiment is at last a failure.

In my opinion there is much of human right as well as republican life involved in this measure, and the note of alarm can not be sounded too soon or too often.

If the principle is once established that man the President is greater than man the citizen we have indeed assumed the regal garb.

Such a measure as this will cause more evil than it will ever cure and breed more anarchy than it will ever suppress.

We have now no aristocracy of birth; let us not create one by law.

"There is no divinity which doth hedge about a king," and none should hedge about the servants of the people. [Loud applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I should like very much if I could get an extension of time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will remind the gentleman that under the rule adopted that is not possible.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. In about ten minutes I would conclude.

Mr. LANHAM. So far as I am concerned, I should have no objection to the extension; but I am unable to yield to the gentleman any further time.

Mr. RAY of New York. I do not see how the committee can extend the time limited by the House. I would gladly yield to the gentleman further time if I could.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. Though I intended to make more extended remarks, I would like to proceed for about ten minutes, if there be no objection.

Mr. RAY of New York. I do not see how it can be done, as the House itself has fixed the time. I submit the matter to the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is obliged to rule that the House having fixed the time, it is not possible for the Committee of the Whole to extend it.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. Well, Mr. Chairman, I will then ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has that privilege already.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON].

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I do not flatter myself at all that I can add anything of interest or of information to the discussion that has already taken place on this subject. I am satisfied, from the variety of legal opinions that have been given during this discussion, as to what would naturally arise in a case brought under this bill if it becomes a law, that it would be unwise to pass it in its present state. Able and distinguished lawyers have given able and learned views of the construction of this bill, and so they would in a court of justice. They differ here, and so they would differ on a trial of the defendant who assassinated the President. Why? Because there are conditions and limitations in this bill, one of which is when he is in the discharge of his official act, another is when he is in his official character. Another is when he has omitted to do something or has done something for which he is murdered. I contend that those three conditions are simply adding to the opportunity of the defendant to escape under a technicality, and I believe that the Congress of the United States can only meet the demands of the people in this respect by passing a plain, simple, easily understood and easily construed law to the effect that any person who unlawfully, willfully, and purposely kills the President of the United States is guilty of murder in the first degree and shall suffer the penalty of death. That is the kind of a bill that I want to vote for. I am not disposed to stand here and split legal hairs and weave fine-spun theories upon one thing and another when the act of killing the President is aimed at the very life of the Government.

I believe that we find warrant and authority in the Constitution to protect the President against the attack of the assassin. We should earnestly avoid encumbering this bill with loopholes of construction.

Mr. Chairman, we all admit that it was the sad death of Mr. McKinley that instigated and inspired this demand that is made by the people that a suitable, plain, and efficient law shall be placed upon our statute book for the protection of the life of our President. It is right and becoming that we should respond to this demand. I have no hesitancy in saying on this floor that in my humble opinion no national event of a personal nature ever transpired in the history of this country that cast such universal gloom over the land as the sad and untimely death of President McKinley.

It appealed to the tenderest and strongest chords of love, sorrow, and indignation in the hearts of the American people, and it was right that it should. I recall now, Mr. Chairman, a public occasion in which his personality impressed itself in a most remarkable manner upon an immense audience. It was at the beginning of his Southern Pacific tour, when he received, in fact, the first ovation of his trip from the public, in the town where I live, Huntsville, Ala.

It was my pleasure, pride, and honor to present him to our people, and the first thing that he said in greeting me was, "How many people do you think are here?" I said, "Mr. President, possibly 10,000 are here to greet you." I never will forget the smile that passed over his face as he gazed upon that large audience. He said to me, "They tell me that the Federal and the Confederate veterans have marched down here arm in arm to greet me to-day. Point me where they are."

I did, and I pledge you my word that I have never heard in the history of this country grander, nobler, more patriotic, and broader American sentiments than he uttered there that day, addressing those noble veterans of the two armies of the blue and the gray. He spoke as one inspired by a love of country that knew no sections. In glowing words he spoke of the sons of Federals and Confederates who followed our flag in Cuba and charged the hills of San Juan. In breathless suspense his audience hung on his glowing words and his splendid tributes. Not a word or syllable fell from his lips but that of peace, love, and happiness. I have never seen an immense audience drawn so closely to a man as he drew that Southern crowd that day. Again, a large portion of that same audience that greeted him at the depot on the 30th of April gave expression to their admiration and esteem, for hardly ninety days had elapsed before many of those same people who had greeted him at that depot met at the memorial services to express their sorrow for his untimely death.

On that sad occasion, when the day of his greeting and the sentiments that he breathed in the presence of that Southern crowd were referred to, there was not a dry eye in that whole Southern audience. The South honored and had profound respect for President McKinley. He treated us just and fairly. He was a brave and a magnanimous soldier, and he loved his country and all its people. I am justified and authorized in the proper way and spirit to draw a contrast between the grand, noble, and patriotic sentiments that President McKinley expressed on that occasion, the 30th of April, 1901, and sentiments recently uttered by President Roosevelt on a recent national and notable occasion.

It was a beautiful day in spring, the last day of May—Memorial Day. Nature seemed to be hushed in honored silence for the occasion which thousands of good people had gathered to honor and celebrate. With the thronging, pressing thousands I found my way to Arlington and watched and listened with profound interest and honor to the touching and beautiful ceremonies. I stood with fully a thousand citizens with uncovered heads around a mound at Arlington Cemetery which contained the remains of over 2,000 brave Union soldiers, whose names were unknown, who gave their lives for the defense of the flag in the great civil war. They had been tenderly removed from the battlefields of the South and placed in one common grave. There slept in that mound more than 2,000 brave, noble, and unknown men who had died on different battlefields for their country. Everyone seemed inspired by the solemnity of that occasion. The contrast that I desire to make I will now proceed to read:

> There were abuses, and to spare, in the civil war. Your false friends then called Grant a "butcher," and spoke of you who are listening to me as mercenaries, as "Lincoln's hirelings." Your open foes—as in the resolution passed by the Confederate congress in October, 1862—accused you, at great length and with much particularity, of "contemptuous disregard of the usages of civilized war;" of subjecting women and children to "banishment, imprisonment, and death;" of "murder," of "rapine," of "outrages on women," of "lawless cruelty," of "perpetrating atrocities which would be disgraceful to savages;" and Abraham Lincoln was singled out for especial attack because of his "spirit of barbarous ferocity." Verily, these men who thus foully slandered you have their heirs to-day in those who traduce our armies in the Philippines, who fix their eyes on individual deeds of wrong so keenly that at last they become blind to the great work of peace and freedom that has already been accomplished.

It would have been well for the President to have read Mr. Lincoln's great speech at Gettysburg. The question arises in the mind of everyone on the floor of the House—yes, it has quietly passed through the minds of millions of brave and generous men of the North—could President McKinley have been induced to utter at any time, and especially on Memorial Day, sentiments and expressions such as these—expressions that were drawn from the fierce days of passion when the brave men of the North and South met each other in bloody conflict? The emphatic answer comes, "Never." I sincerely regret that the President was led into such strenuous indiscretion. The President certainly forgot that many of the "heirs to-day" of the men from whom he was quoting were sleeping their last sleep at Arlington, having lost their lives in the Spanish-American war under the flag of our country. Who, we ask, are the "heirs to-day" of the men to whom the President referred? It is the South. Probably the country would have been better pleased if the President had devoted more of his speech to the memory of Mr. McKinley.

I will not, Mr. Chairman, so far forget the environments and proprieties that are about me here to-day, in my position as a Representative on the floor of this House, as to be induced to characterize this language used by the President as it justly deserves. It came from the President of the United States on a most solemn memorial occasion, the day of honor to the thousands of brave Union dead that had fallen in defense of the flag of the Union. I dare say, Mr. Chairman, that it would have been far more appropriate and agreeable for the President to have referred to the liberal and patriotic terms that General Grant gave to General Lee and his brave and exhausted soldiers at the surrender at Appomattox, which did more to bring reconciliation to the contending sections of our country than anything else that has transpired since that memorable event. I speak of the Federal soldiers, because it was my duty and my pride to meet them on many of the bloodiest battlefields of the South.

There is not a Federal soldier within the hearing of my voice on this floor who would have uttered such sentiments here or elsewhere—much less have done it on Memorial Day at Arlington. I say, and you will agree with me, that the proprieties of the occasion were violated. I felt and I believe, and now state, for the President of the United States to refer to what was said about Mr. Lincoln in the heat of blood, when we were taking each other's lives, forty-odd years nearly after the war had ceased, was certainly unbecoming, and the country has accepted it in that light. No man in this country has greater reverence and respect for the honor of the position of President than I have, and for that reason I am ready and willing here to-day to do anything that is within reason, as I have indicated, to protect his life and the life of the Vice-President.

The President in his Memorial Day speech was certainly in one of his most strenuous moods, for he not only thrust his officia hand into the bloody days of the war, but he referred on that Memorial Day to the very cheap political stock in trade that is used against the South on all convenient occasions. Here is what our President said about us:

From time to time there occur in our country, to the deep and lasting shame of our people, lynchings carried on under circumstances of inhuman cruelty and barbarity—a cruelty infinitely worse than any that has ever been committed by our troops in the Philippines; worse to the victims, and far more brutalizing to those guilty of it. The men who fail to condemn these lynchings, and yet clamor about what has been done in the Philippines, are indeed guilty of neglecting the beam in their own eye while taunting their brother about the mote in his. Understand me. These lynchings afford us no excuse for failure to stop cruelty in the Philippines. Every effort is being made, and will be made, to minimize the chances of cruelty occurring.

Of course no one has ever intimated that the lynchings of the South afford "any excuse for failure to stop cruelty in the Philippines." Everybody regrets that there has occurred cruelties on the part of any of our soldiers in the Philippines. We all realize that cruelties are incidents of war, not chargeable to the entire Army, however. But what, I ask our President, has lynchings in the North or South to do with the criticisms that some people have passed on General Smith's order in the Philippines or the application of the so-called "water cure." It is well known that the able and distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, Senator HOAR, has criticised the cruelties perpetrated in the Philippines with much severity, charging it as a result of our Philippine policy. The distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY] was, I believe, the first and bitterest denouncer on the floor of the House of General Smith and his order. Both of these distinguished gentlemen are Republicans.

No people have ever suffered more from this outrage than the people of the South. Yes, they have suffered more than the negro has, but think you that it is likely that we on our part will accept an admonition and a chiding administered in that way and for such a purpose on so solemn an occasion about that which we deplore more than do the people of the North? We know, Mr. Chairman, that each scene of horror, such as shock the sensibilities of the world, is but the bloody sequel of deflowered Southern womanhood and the destruction of a happy home in the South. The people of the South know and feel that lynching degenerates to a spirit of lawlessness. We would gladly stop it. But what will you do about it?

Why, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS], in the discussion of this bill, in a kind and lovable spirit and manner said that he believed that if the assassination of Mr. McKinley had occurred in the South that Czolgosz, the assassin, would have been strung up to the first lamp-post and the courts would not have been troubled with him. The people of the South are generous, brave, and impulsive. They despise a low, cowardly, mean, sneaking act, and swift and sure sometimes is their vengeance. They admired and honored President McKinley, and I don't think his assassin would have been in a comfortable position in "Dixie's Land." But the President knew, when he referred to lynching, that the Constitution gave no warrant for Federal interference in the criminal jurisprudence of the several States, but yet on this national Memorial Day he referred in no uncertain words to this sensitive and inflammable subject. It looks to me inappropriate and unwise as well as unjust. It smacked verily of political purpose and the future. I do not defend nor apologize for the lynchings in the South.

And now, Mr. Chairman, I object to this bill, and will hurriedly present my reasons. I object to it, as I have said, because it preserves conditions. I see that my time is rapidly drawing to a close. I object to the eighth and ninth sections of this bill, and I say to the gentlemen here who are supporting it that if it had been the law at the time of the Armenian slaughters by the Sultan of Turkey quite every local minister in this country would have been made liable to twenty years behind the bars. Section 8 provides:

SEC. 8. That any person who advocates, advises, or teaches the duty, necessity, or propriety of the unlawful killing or assaulting of one or more of the officers (either of specific individuals or officers generally) of the Government of the United States, or of the government of any civilized nation, because of his or their official character, or who openly, willfully, and deliberately justifies such killing or assaulting, with intent to cause the commission of any of the offenses specified in the first nine sections of this act, shall be fined not less than $500 nor more than $5,000, or imprisoned not less than one nor more than twenty years, or both.

This is ostensibly aimed at anarchists, but can anyone deny that thousands of native-born Americans of good standing and character can be sent to the penitentiary for twenty years and fined $5,000 for expressing an opinion?

I ask, Mr. Chairman, where is the necessity for this Government of ours to protect the Czar of Russia in his own kingdom? What have we to do with the protection of Nicholas the Czar of all the Russias? I say that if this law had been in force at the time of the Armenian slaughters the criticisms made by the pulpits and Christian people throughout this country would have laid them liable to imprisonment for saying that the Sultan of Turkey ought to be dethroned and killed. Yet this bill purports on its face to be a measure for the protection of the President of the United States. What business, I ask, Mr. Chairman, is it of ours to protect a monarch on his throne or the Czar of Russia in his own unlimited dominions? Yet this bill proposes to do that, when the demand of the country is that Congress shall frame a law to protect the life of our President.

What business is it of the lawmakers of this country to protect autocrats and monarchs on their thrones? We can treat them courteously and protect them when they come to our country officially. That is all right. Sir, this Republic of ours, of which we have just cause to be proud, stands the world over as the greatest living protest against the rule of kings, queens, czars, and emperors. There are to-day thousands and thousands of liberty-loving Americans who would rejoice to see a democratic free government supplant and overthrow every crowned head in Europe. This is natural. And yet we are called on in this bill to protect, shelter, guard, and, indeed, foster these monarchs and royal personages in their own homes.

Surely the great Judiciary Committee of the House is not serious in this matter. I dare say under the provisions of this bill quite one-half of the members of this House could have been convicted for expressions of sympathy for the Boers in their brave and heroic struggle for freedom, and whose flag has just gone down in defeat. The bill says not merely a person who advocates, advises, or teaches the duty, necessity, or propriety of the unlawful killing or assaulting of one or more of the "officers generally," but one who "justifies" such assault is also guilty.

I can not follow the extraordinary meaning and scope of the words used in this section. It is a plain, open assault of the most aggravated character upon the rights of the citizen. It is a bold attempt to make the Federal courts the censors of public opionion. All of this is done under the mistaken effort to protect the life of the President of the United States. We must protect the President, but not in this way. Why, under the provisions of this section under the term "officers generally" one-half of the white people of the South could have been made liable to its penalties in the past, because a negro postmaster falls under the designation of "officers generally."

Under this section any provocation given to strike or assault a negro postmaster would be an offense and twenty years in jail would be given to the offender and the same to the man who justified the assault on the negro postmaster. It is not unfrequently the case that such characters are required to "move away." Such a law in the hands of a partisan Federal judge could be used as an engine of destruction, oppression, and tyranny. Jefferson warned us against the extension of the powers of the Federal courts.

I now, in conclusion, briefly call attention to section 9 of the bill, which reads:

That any person who conspires with any other person or persons, or requests, advises, or encourages any other person or persons, to unlawfully assault or kill within or without the United States the chief executive or chief magistrate of any other civilized nation having an organized government because of his official character shall be punished as follows.

The punishment is made death if the party assulted dies. If he does not die, twenty-five years in penitentiary. If such attempt is not made on the life of the foreign official, then the offender shall be imprisoned not less than five years for thinking about it or having mentioned it probably to some one else. This section truly Russianizes the United States.

The word "encourages" as used in this section has a broad and significant meaning. Under it I believe that a man quoted in an interview and published in a newspaper as saying that the Czar of Russia was a tyrant and ought to be shot because he ruthlessly and cruelly expelled the Jews from his dominions, and the Czar was afterwards killed by an assassin at his capital, and it was shown that the assassin had read the interview before the perpetration of the crime, then the man giving the interview would be adjudged guilty of having encouraged the death of the Czar.

That interview would certainly mean encouragement. I am free to say that I can not believe that anyone seriously believes that a citizen of this country could really be punished or imprisoned about expressing an opinion unfriendly to the rule of a monarch in a foreign land. Our Constitution protects us fully against such a wrong as that. Why then harass and annoy the citizens with such laws? The American Congress can be relied on fully, I think, to put its foot on such legislation.

I am opposed, Mr. Chairman, to section 3 of this bill, which throws around foreign ambassadors and ministers the same protection it does to the life of our President. We will treat all of that class all right, but the President of this country ought to be protected in his life not because his life is more sacred or valuable than the humblest citizen of the land, but because he is the official head of our Government, and an assault on his life is an attack on our Government.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I believe I have now fifteen minutes remaining.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has fifteen minutes remaining.

Mr. LANHAM. I will apportion that time in this way: I yield five minutes to my colleague from Texas [Mr. KLEBERG] and the ten minutes remaining to my colleague on the Committee on the Judiciary [Mr. SMITH of Kentucky]. The Chair can recognize them in that order.

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Chairman, I shall address myself especially to the sections which deal with the subject of the suppression of anarchy. In doing so I wish it known, first of all, that there is not a member on this floor who more deprecates that kind of organization in our midst and who is more willing to go, as far constitutionally as we can, than I am to suppress it, as far as Federal legislation will do it, leaving the balance of it to the States.

I am willing to prevent all that by any necessary amendment to the immigration laws, and to keep them from becoming citizens, and leave the balance of it with the State. But in this bill I object to a certain clause in it, which is dangerous to the liberties of our people and the press, and especially I refer to section 9, and the words used in that section which refer to this subject in these words: "Any person who shall encourage another to commit an assault upon a foreign ruler or the highest executive of a foreign nation," etc., dealing exclusively with foreign rulers. Now, I say there is nothing in this section which deals in the remotest degree with an attack upon the President, the Vice-President, or any other officer of the United States, and the entire section is foreign to the purpose of the bill.

SEC. 9. That any person who conspires with any other person or persons, or requests, advises, or encourages any other person or persons to unlawfully assault or kill, within or without the United States, the chief executive or chief magistrate of any other civilized nation having an organized government, because of his official character, shall be punished as follows: If an attempt to commit such act is made and the death of any person results therefrom, such offender shall suffer death. If such attempt does not result in death, such offender shall be fined not less than five hundred nor more than five thousand dollars, or be imprisoned not less than five nor more than twenty-five years, or both. If such attempt is not made, such offender shall be fined not less than five hundred nor more than five thousand dollars, or be imprisoned not less than one nor more than five years, or both.

But we have there the words that "anyone who encourages an assault on or killing of a foreign ruler," etc. Now, I say that under the powers of judicial construction in the courts that these words are dangerous words and should be expunged from this bill. Under the judicial power of construction it could be construed to mean that, directly or indirectly, anyone by the use of printed matter in the newspapers, or words spoken in the heat of passion, or resolutions passed at a political meeting inveighing against foreign rulers and which possibly will incite to action some man who hates rulers and who would possibly be impelled to go and make an assault upon a foreign ruler—it would subject the speaker or writer to punishment of death.

An orator, a public speaker, a newspaper, when attacking such ruler for abuse of power abroad, a person on American soil would be amenable under this law to a prosecution by a foreign ruler, a king, a czar, or an emperor, or what not, who could ask under such a law for the punishment of all persons who had been encouraging another person indirectly in print or by speech unintentionally, and we would see this country turned over by sleuth-hounds, newspaper offices ransacked, orators and public speakers upon the stump possibly arrested and thrown in jail, actions of conventions questioned, and our citizens generally brought under the ban of suspicion that they had possibly encouraged, either directly or indirectly, some rattle-brained man who felt it his duty to assault a foreign potentate. Not only this, but in the closing clause of that section, if the assault is not even committed, if nothing comes of it, a person so encouraging shall be imprisoned and be liable to a fine.

Now, I say I do not wish to reflect upon the committee, but this does seem to me to be an attempt to interfere with the liberty of free speech and the freedom of the press, and though it will pass muster of its constitutionality in the courts, because there is nothing on the face of this section which would bear possibly that construction of its unconstitutionality, yet under the power of judicial construction it can easily be warped to mean that very thing—that is, abridge the liberty of speech and the press in the manner pointed out by me. Now, even if an editor uses intemperate language, or a public speaker, or any man in a political meeting, or by resolution, should criticise a foreign ruler by words which would go to incite action upon the part of somebody to commit this crime, that would make them amenable to a prosecution.

Now, I protest against the idea of placing the rights and liberties of American citizens under the surveillance and control of a foreign potentate. I am willing and ready to furnish all means to protect foreign representatives who come to this country, and to extend them due civility. I am willing even to submit to a special embassy to go to a coronation of a foreign potentate, but when it comes to the suppression of free speech and a proposition to interfere with the freedom of the press and to place a foreign censorship over them, then I draw the line, and as an American citizen, born to the manor, free, white, and 21, I protest in the name of American liberty-loving citizenship, and stand by free speech and the freedom of the press. [Loud applause.]

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, it was not my purpose to participate in the general debate upon this bill, and I must now do so, if at all, without previous preparation; hence if my remarks shall be lacking in continuity of thought or aptness of expression I am sure there will be no disposition to criticise them.

When the Committee on the Judiciary of the House was appointed and organized at the beginning of this session there were a score or more bills relating to the subjects covered by the substitute offered now for the pending Senate bill awaiting its consideration. No doubt that the introduction of many, perhaps all, of them was superinduced by the cruel, treacherous, and shocking assassination of our late amiable and lamented President McKinley, just as experience has often heretofore shown the propriety or necessity of important legislation. If, however, there are those here who entertain apprehension that the proposed legislation has been hastily considered and reported by the committee, I wish to assure them that within my five years' service on that committee no measure has received a more critical examination, thorough analysis, and exhaustive consideration than was given by it to this subject and the various bills relating thereto.

I do not approve every provision in this substitute, but it represents the deliberate thought, patriotic purpose, and best judgment of the majority of the members of the committee. Not being one of their number, I may say of the faithful and eminently competent members who supported the provisions of the substitute in toto as reported, that they were untouched and unmoved by any sentiment or purpose other than by a skillful, comprehensive, and constitutional enactment to punish crimes most heinous in character and effectively prevent the spread of the doctrines, the increasing frequency of their deadly deeds, and, if possible, exterminate anarchy and anarchists from our jurisdiction.

Often an intellectual pigmy may with ease and readiness criticise that which has required all the capacities of giant intellects to construct, and I trust that gentlemen will remember in this instance that the problem to be solved is most intricate and the task assigned the committee was exceedingly difficult. And while the substitute presented may not be, and, in my opinion, is not perfect, yet there can be no doubt that it is very much superior to the Senate bill.

In the consideration of this question it is of the utmost importance that gentlemen keep constantly in mind our system of dual governments—the State and Federal.

The duties and powers of each, their relation to each other, and the relation of each to the citizen in the State must not be forgotten or ignored in the very laudable and determined effort to protect the Government and destroy anarchy.

The Federal Government can exercise no power other than those delegated to it by the Constitution, but the State government has all powers not denied to it by its own or the Federal Constitution, while each is supreme within the spheres assigned them under our complex system. In the case of McCulloch v. The State of Maryland (4 Wheat., 405) Chief Justice Marshall declared:

This Government (that of the United States) is acknowledged by all to be one of enumerated powers.

Chief Justice Waite in the case of The United States v. Cruikshank stated:

The Government of the United States is one of delegated powers alone. Its authority is defined and limited by the Constitution. All powers not granted to it by that instrument are reserved to the States and the people. (92 U. S.)

In his opinion, concurred in by Chief Justice Fuller, Justice Lamar, In re Neagle (135 U. S., p. 77), says:

Nor do we question the general propositions that the Federal Government established by the Constitution is absolutely sovereign over every foot of soil and every person within the national territory within the sphere of action assigned it, and that within that sphere its Constitution and laws are the supreme law of the land," etc.

Citations in purport similar to these could be given without limit, but it would be a waste of time to read them.

Every citizen of a State is likewise a citizen of the United States. He has a dual citizenship and owes allegiance to and is charged with many important and distinct duties to each of these sovereignties, which, or any of which, if not voluntarily observed may be coerced from him by the government entitled thereto.

In the opinions of the Supreme Court in the Slaughterhouse Cases and the case of Boyd v. Thayer (143 U. S.) it is said:

Every citizen of a State is ipso facto a citizen of the United States.

In the Slaughterhouse Cases (16 Wall., p. 74) this language appears:

It is quite clear that there is a citizenship of the United States and a citizenship of a State which are distinct from each other and which depend upon different characteristics or circumstances in the individual.

So in the case of The United States v. Cruikshank (92 U. S., 542) the court said:

The people of the United States resident within any State are subject to two governments, one State and the other national, but there need be no conflict between the two. The powers which one possesses the other does not. They are established for different purposes and have separate jurisdictions. Together they make one whole, and furnish the people of the United States with a complete government, ample for the protection of all their rights at home and abroad.

True, it may sometimes happen that a person is amenable to both jurisdictions for one and the same act. Thus, if a marshal of the United States is unlawfully resisted while executing the process of the courts within a State, and the resistance is accompanied by an assault on the officer, the sovereignty of the United States is violated by the resistance, and that of the State by the breach of the peace, in the assault. So, too, if one passes counterfeit coin of the United States within a State, it may be an offense against the United States and the State; the United States because it discredits the coin, and the State because of the fraud upon him to whom it is passed. This does not, however, necessarily imply that the two governments possess powers in common or bring them into conflict with each other. It is the natural consequence of a citizenship which owes allegiance to two sovereignties and claims protection from both. The citizen can not complain, because he has voluntarily submitted himself to such a form of government. He owes allegiance to the two departments, so to speak, and within their respective spheres must pay the penalties which each exacts for disobedience to its laws. In return, he can demand protection from each within its own jurisdiction.

But there are also duties and obligations owing by these governments to the citizen. In return for his allegiance the citizen is entitled to protection in all his rights, privileges, and immunities from them. It is true that under our system neither one of them has undertaken to protect the citizen in all these, but those not assigned to the protection of the one are committed to the guardianship of the other, and thus though some in State and others in Federal jurisdiction, all these are guarded and guaranteed by a power supreme within its proper sphere of operation. As said in the case of Minor v. Hoppersett (21 Wallace, 162):

Allegiance and protection are in this connection reciprocal obligations. The one is compensation for the other; allegiance for protection and protection for allegiance.

In this and kindred legislation it is therefore expedient always that we determine at the outset whether the power invoked has been delegated to the Federal Government, and unless authority for its exercise can be found in the Constitution Congress should stop at the threshhold, for I still believe that in a faithful, intelligent observance of that instrument abides the highest, the best, and, in truth, the only hope for the preservation of republican institutions in this country.

However pleasant and interesting to myself, if not to you, it might be, I will not on this occasion undertake the discussion in detail of the distribution of powers between the State and Federal governments, even to the extent that it would be pertinent to do so. I may say that it is my fixed and deliberate opinion that the State alone is primarily vested with the authority and charged with the grave responsibility of protecting those within its borders in life and limb; that the Federal Government is utterly powerless, and under the Constitution must remain so, to punish for homicide and like crimes committed within the States when there is no other fact upon which to base the jurisdiction than that the victim was a citizen of the United States.

That the States may carry out and discharge such fundamental and essential functions faithfully and well, the Federal Constitution has laid upon them sundry limitations and inhibitions conducive to the ends of justice, and has guaranteed to each a republican form of government. So that the inherent ability of the State government to fulfill its obligations in such matters is reinforced by these provisions of the Federal Constitution, and there can be no such thing as general failure so long as there shall be vitality and vigor in the American system. Now let us see what has been determined by the Supreme Court of the United States touching this matter.

One of the earliest cases bearing upon that question was that of Corfield v. Coryell, in the United States circuit court for the district of Pennsylvania. Mr. Justice Washington delivered the opinion, and therein declared:

We feel no hesitation in confining these expressions to those privileges and immunities which are in their nature fundamental, which belong of right to the citizens of all free governments, and which have at all times been enjoyed by citizens of the several States which compose this Union from the time of their becoming free, independent, and sovereign. What these fundamental principles are it would be more tedious than difficult to enumerate. They may, however, be all comprehended under the following general heads: Protection by the Government; * * * the enjoyment of life and liberty, with the right to acquire and possess property of every kind and to pursue and obtain happiness and safety, subject, nevertheless, to such restraints as the Government may prescribe for the general good of the whole. (4 Washington C. C., 371.)

True it is this case was decided in a circuit court, but the opinion was rendered by a member of the Supreme bench, and it has been frequently approved by the Supreme Court.

In the Slaughterhouse Cases (16 Wall.) Justice Miller, having quoted the language of Justice Washington as I have stated it, said:

It would be the vainest show of learning to attempt to prove by citation of authority that up to the adoption of the recent amendments no claim or pretense was set up that those rights depended on the Federal Government for their existence or protection beyond the very few express limitations which the Federal Constitution imposed upon the States—such, for instance, as the prohibition against ex post facto laws, bills of attainder, and laws impairing the obligations of contracts. But with the exceptions of these and a few other restrictions, the entire domain of the privileges and immunities of citizens of the States, as above defined (by Washington), lay within the constitutional and legislative power of the States and without that of the Federal Government.

The learned justice then puts certain questions intended to bring out the fallacy of the contention that the fourteenth amendment had wrought such change as to render the former construction inapplicable and commented thereupon, after which he proceeded to say:

We are convinced that no such results were intended by the Congress which proposed these amendments nor by the legislatures of the States which ratified them.

But the able and distinguished justice did not stop at his approval of Justice Washington's enumeration of rights left to the care of the local jurisdiction, but he pointed out some of the rights, privileges, and immunities of a citizen of the United States as such. Among them he mentioned the right to travel to the seat of government to assert claims or transact business, free access to the seaports, to demand the care and protection of the Federal Government over his life, liberty, and property when on the high seas or within foreign jurisdictions, to the habeas corpus, and to use the navigable waters of the United States, as well as a number of others.

In the case of Maxwell v. Dow (176 U. S., 591) the Supreme Court, speaking through Mr. Justice Peckham, refers to Justice Miller's opinion in the Slaughterhouse Cases at much length, and among other things, says:

The definition of the words "privileges and immunities," as given by Mr. Justice Washington, was adopted in substance in Paul v. Virginia (8 Wall., 168) and Ward v. Maryland (12 Wall., 418). These rights, it is said in the Slaughterhouse cases, have always been held to be the class of rights which the State governments were created to establish and secure. The opinion upon the matters actually involved and maintained by the judgment in the case has never been doubted or overruled by any judgment of this court.

Perhaps the most direct and specific utterance upon the question by the Supreme Court is to be found in the opinion in the case of The United States v. Cruikshank (92 U. S., 542), in which it is declared:

The very highest duty of the States when they entered into the Union under the Constitution was to protect all persons within their boundaries in the enjoyment of these "unalienable rights with which they were endowed by their Creator." Sovereignty, for this purpose, rests alone with the States. It is no more the duty or within the power of the United States to punish for a conspiracy to falsely imprison or murder within a State than it would be to punish for false imprisonment or murder itself.

There are many other cases that have been or will be quoted by other gentlemen in the discussion sustaining this proposition, and altogether it seems to me to be well established that it is beyond the constitutional power of Congress to enact any law that will confer jurisdiction on the Federal courts to try anyone for homicide committed in a State merely because his victim was a citizen of the United States. There is no attempt by the committee to justify the constitutionality of this bill upon that theory. It must and does rest upon the power and the duty of preserving and protecting itself against those who would obstruct, resist, or destroy it. The Government does not consist alone of the Constitution and the laws, but of officers as well. Without the written Constitution the Government would no doubt be bad, but without officers there can be no government, while with both, as we now have, it is no better than the people are entitled to have.

When the citizen of a State enters into and becomes part of the machinery of the Federal Government he without ceasing to be a citizen becomes a public servant and is clothed with a new and distinct though artificial existence or official character, so that such an one has not only a dual citizenship but dual capacity—individual and official—and is at some times engaged in the discharge of official duties and at other times exercising rights and privileges pertaining to himself as a citizen wholly and completely apart from his official position. I may very appropriately say in this connection that I do not concur in the opinion of the honorable chairman of the Judiciary Committee that the President is always engaged in the discharge of his official duties.

While I have not the least doubt of the exclusive authority of the State to the extent I have indicated, yet I as sincerely believe that the Federal Government has the constitutional power to do so, and should be charged with the duty of protecting its officers in their proper official service and character. If officers essential to, and the only agencies by which, the Government can execute its functions, can be obstructed, resisted, and assassinated with no power on its part to protect them, prevent or punish such deeds, then in truth it is without a parallel in all governments present and past the world has ever known.

It is no sufficient answer to say that when such inexcusable and sometimes heinous crimes occur in the States they will be promptly and severely dealt with in the State courts. I have the utmost confidence in and greatest respect for these local tribunals. But they must enforce the law as it is written in the State statutes. The lack of uniformity in the punishment fo.

any given crime under the statutes of the various States, and the absolute inadequacy of the punishment prescribed by the statutes of some of the States for such crimes are full answers to that contention. Had President McKinley survived his wounds his assailant could not have been punished with longer imprisonment than ten years, and had he been as cruelly assassinated as he was in certain other States the extreme punishment would have been life imprisonment. The American people would have characterized such results as worse than farcical or contemptible. But the real answer to that claim is, that it is a sound rule in political economy that every government shall have the jurisdiction to punish offenses committed against itself. It might as well be claimed that offenses committed in and against one State should be cognizable in the courts of another, or that offenses against any State should be punished in the courts of the United States, as to assert that offenses against the latter should be tried in the State court.

No one has been heard to deny that to strike down a Federal officer while he is engaged in his official duty interferes with and obstructs the Government, or that to do so because of his official character or conduct is a blow aimed at the Government itself.

It is upon the theory that the Government has the constitutional power to preserve and protect itself that Congress should pass some legislation on this subject.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman allow me, if it will not interrupt him?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. No, it will not interrupt me; I am speaking extemporaneously.

Mr. BARTLETT. This provision of the bill which protects not only the President but the Vice-President, and so on down the line, does not the gentleman think the extending of the law—for it is extending the law virtually, to include the killing of the Vice-President and the members of the Cabinet and the ambassadors—is going much further than even the English people ever went when they defined treason as an attempt to take the life of the King, his consort, and his oldest son; in other words, by extending this along down the line, we virtually make that treason which was never done in England?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I believe the provisions in this bill reach further than did the law of England against treason.

Mr. BARTLETT. Is it not a fact that this bill protects the President and makes it virtually treason, because the Constitution does not permit you to call it treason?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I presume so. If the power had existed under the Constitution to have made these things denounced in this bill against the President and his Cabinet who are in the line of succession treason, it might have been preferable, and I think this bill ought to be characterized "A bill to prevent the obstruction of the Government." This is what I think it ought to be entitled, for I think that is what it is. Its design is to prevent the obstruction of the performance of the duties of certain officials of the Federal Government, and not, as some gentlemen who have spoken on the other side seem to think, that it is against the murder or the killing of a citizen. That is but an incident of the crime sought to be punished by this measure.

Mr. RAY of New York. My colleague will remember that among the amendments we propose to the bill is one which prevents crimes against the Government, which embraces the idea of the gentleman.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. That is true.

Mr. Chairman, the Supreme Court of the United States in the Cruikshank case substantially held that it was within the constitutional power of Congress to enact such laws as this, for in that decision it is said:

> The Government thus established and defined is to some extent a government of the States in their political capacity. It is also for certain purposes a government of the people. Its powers are limited in number, but not in degree. Within the scope of its powers, as enumerated and defined, it is supreme and above the States, but beyond it has no existence. It was erected for special purposes and endowed with all the powers necessary for its own preservation and the accomplishment of the ends its people had in view. It can neither grant nor secure to its citizens any right or privilege not expressly or by implication placed under its jurisdiction.

In re Neagle both opinions held that the Federal Government has under the Constitution the full and complete power to protect itself. In the dissenting opinion it is stated:

> We recognize that the powers of the Government within its sphere, as defined by the Constitution and interpreted by the well-settled principles which have resulted from a century of wise and patriotic analysis, are supreme; that these supreme powers extend to the protection of itself and all of its agencies, as well as to the preservation and the perpetuation of its usefulness, and that these powers may be found not only in the expressed authorities conferred by the Constitution, but also in the necessary and proper implications.

So said Chief Justice Fuller and Justice Lamar.

The criticism that the substitute prescribes the death penalty not only for murder but for certain other homicides that are under the statutes of the various States punishable by imprisonment for life in some and a term of years in others has some force. I think it would be wiser and more conservative to make the description of the crimes to be denounced in the first three sections correspond with that of murder, and I shall at the proper time offer the amendments necessary to accomplish this change. These crimes as defined in the substitute, however, approximate murder so nearly and are so manifestly inspired by an evil intent and design against the Government itself that the defeat of this measure can not be justified on that ground. It is urged by some that he who kills one of the high officials embraced by the terms of this bill should be punished more severely than for the killing of a plain citizen upon the idea that their lives are more important to the public than is the life of the nonofficial.

This fact may be and doubtless is true, but it does not follow as a logical sequence in sound public policy that the culprit should be any more harshly dealt with in the one case than in the other. Men in every community vary in their importance; some have more reputation, some have more money, some have more sense, some have more charity, and in a hundred other respects they differ in importance, but I never heard of any demand in any State, for any such an adjustment of criminal statutes that the punishment of criminals would be regulated according to the standing in any particular or generally of the victim.

There is neither good policy nor sufficient reason for the section relative to the foreign ambassadors and ministers. Those diplomats are neither citizens nor officers of the United States, and when, so far as life and property are concerned, the same protection is given them under existing conditions as are secured to our own citizens every international obligation and duty has been fulfilled. I can but feel that its retention is indicative of an unhealthy condition of public sentiment, and shall support a motion to strike it out. I also think that section 13 should, on general principles, be stricken from the bill.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Yes, sir.

Mr. BARTLETT. Is it not true, with reference to this bill, that in order to give jurisdiction to the United States court, or the trial of a case at all, the very heart of the offense is the assault upon or killing of the President or other officer, either because he is an officer of the United States or because he was engaged in the discharge of his official duties? Without that, according to the report of the committee as made by its chairman, the bill would not be constitutional. But this section proposes absolutely to presume that the very essence of the case is proven without a word of truth having been submitted. Is not that true?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Well, yes; it creates a presumption in favor of a jurisdictional fact; but should the section be retained it can not result in any greater detriment to an accused than to require him to answer in a Federal instead of a State court. The presumption there declared is applicable only when the unlawful killing is charged to have been committed when the officer was engaged in the discharge of his official duties. That the accused unlawfully, purposely, and knowingly killed a Federal official must be established beyond a reasonable doubt by evidence. If that shall have been done, then he is punishable for a crime in the State court, or if such deed is shown to have been committed while the official was engaged in his official duties he would under this act be subject to Federal jurisdiction. Hence the only immediate result will be to affect the question of jurisdiction.

I have thus pointed out briefly the principal objections that can be urged against the committee's substitute. Upon the whole, however, this measure has considerable merit. It will provide not only a uniform but a commensurate punishment for those crimes. Its provisions relative to the teachings of anarchy and the conspiracies and crimes resulting therefrom are most excellent and commendable and will no doubt receive the approval of the people who have appreciated the necessity for and earnestly urged the enactment of stringent legislation on the subject. [Applause.]

Mr. RAY of New York. I yield the residue of my time to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD].

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield a moment to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SCOTT].

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, as one not trained in "the lawless science of the law," unskilled in the dialectics of its books and schools, I hesitate to avail myself of the opportunity afforded me by the courtesy of the distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] to engage in the discussion of the pending measure. The sentiment of the great and patriotic State which I have the honor to represent on this floor is so united and earnest, however, in support of the objects sought to be gained by the passage of this bill that I feel as if I should be remiss in my duty if I should fail to give expression to it here.

I can easily understand the attitude of gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber who have arrayed themselves in almost unanimous opposition to this measure. With a fidelity to the traditions of their party which does credit to their heart, if not to their intelligence, they have gone to the melancholy grave at Appomattox and conjured forth the poor ghost of State's rights and have thrust it forward here as justification for their opposition to a measure which seeks to give the nation's protection to the nation's President. "We must not trench upon the rights and powers of the States with Federal legislation," these gentlemen assert. "There is no 'dignity which doth hedge about a king' in this great country," they say, "and therefore a statute which seeks to give him special protection violates every principle and tradition of our history."

I say I can understand such an attitude as this on the part of gentlemen on the other side, for I have read the history of the Democratic party; but I must say, and I am very glad to say, I can not sympathize with it. As an academic proposition I think I have a fair understanding of the relations existing between the several States and the Federal Government, and their respective powers and privileges; but as a practical question it has never worried me. No intelligent American needs to be told that the proper adjustment of the relations which should exist between the States and the General Government was the first and greatest of the problems which confronted the makers of the Constitution; but why, at this stage of our national life, State lines should be held of any importance except as a mere political convenience to facilitate the operations of self-government among the people has been to me always a curious thing.

No citizen of Kansas has ever been accused of lacking a proper degree of State pride; but I never heard or heard of any citizen of that State expressing a feeling of jealousy or suspicion toward the United States of America, or protesting that the Federal Government was trespassing upon the rights of the sovereign State of Kansas. Kansas was settled in large part by ex-soldiers of the Union Army. They went out there with the idea somewhat firmly fixed in their minds that they had settled for all time the question as to whether the United States was one sovereignty or forty-five; and they are still of that opinion. The idea, therefore, that in passing a law authorizing the Federal courts to take jurisdiction of an assault upon the life of the President Congress would be authorizing the General Government to usurp a function that should be left to New York or Ohio or Arkansas or any other State would simply never occur to the mind of a citizen of Kansas.

I have no sympathy either with the objection to this measure which is grounded on the proposition that the life of the President is no more precious than the life of any other citizen and is therefore not entitled to special protection. When one man is singled out from among 80,000,000 of people, and by the free, uncoerced, and uncorrupted franchise of his fellow-citizens is chosen as their Chief Executive and becomes vested with powers and duties and responsibilities upon the proper exercise and discharge of which the happiness and prosperity of the whole nation may largely depend, is it not idle to assert that the life of this man is of no greater value to the nation than the life of any private citizen?

It is of infinitely greater value, not only because of the vastly important functions which the President exercises, but because he stands as the representative of the sovereignty of the nation, so that an assault upon him has the element of treason as well as of murder in it, combining thus the two highest crimes known to human jurisprudence. Who among us can not recall the mingled feelings with which we heard of the assassination of William McKinley? The feeling of grief, first, for the loss of a man we so much loved, and then the sentiment of rage that an impious hand had been lifted against our country. Not one of us but felt that the whole nation had been outraged and insulted. The feeling was less in degree, perhaps, but it was the same in kind as if a foreign warship had fired without cause upon a merchant vessel flying the American flag.

In this latter case, supposing it should ever happen, is there one among us who would be content to leave it to the State whose citizens might happen to own the merchant vessel to exact retribution from the power whose warship had offended? Would not every American citizen instantly demand that the whole power of the nation should be invoked to avenge the insult which all the people had suffered by the assault upon their flag? Well, is not an attack upon the President because he is President as much an insult to all the people as an attack upon a ship which bears our flag? And is there any more reason why we should be content to let a single State take entire jurisdiction of the crime in one case than in the other? An assault upon the President because he is President is a crime against the nation. A crime against the nation should be placed within the jurisdiction of the courts which represent the nation. This Congress should serve notice on all the foul breed of anarchy that when any one of them assaults the nation through the nation's head he will have every American citizen, through the nation's courts, to reckon with.

While I disagree utterly, therefore, with the views entertained upon the other side of this Chamber, I regret very much to find myself unable to approve without qualification the bill which the majority of the Committee on Judiciary has presented for our consideration. The first section of this bill reads as follows:

> That any person who unlawfully, purposely, and knowingly kills the President of the United States while he is engaged in the performance of his official duties, or because of his official character, or because of any of his official acts or omissions, shall suffer death.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] has given notice that at the proper time he will move to amend this section by striking out the words "while he is engaged in the performance of his official duties, or because of his official character, or because of any of his official acts or omissions;" so that it will read: "That any person who unlawfully, purposely, and knowingly kills the President of the United States shall suffer death"—and I most earnestly hope this motion will prevail.

I am aware, of course, that the qualifying words which this amendment proposes to strike out were inserted because, in the judgment of the majority of the committee, they were deemed necessary to insure the constitutionality of the act, and I have listened most attentively to the very able and exhaustive arguments by which the distinguished chairman of the committee and his colleagues have sought to enforce this view of the question.

But I must confess that I remain unconvinced. In the first place, I think it will be conceded that all the Supreme Court opinions which have been so voluminously cited in this debate have been utterances of interpretation and not of exposition. The Supreme Court has undoubtedly declared in numerous instances that statutes enacted for the protection of United States officers while in the discharge of their duties are constitutional, but it has in no case cited here declared that a statute enacted for the protection of such officials during the entire term of their office would not be constitutional. And I submit that, to the lay mind at least, the declaration of the court that Federal courts can properly take jurisdiction of assaults committed upon a Federal officer while in the performance of his duty by no means warrants the implication that the Federal courts could not also take jurisdiction of an assault committed upon a Federal officer while not in the immediate discharge of his duty, provided such a case were covered by a properly enacted statute.

With all due deference to the eminent lawyers who have discussed this question so learnedly, it seems to me they have lost sight of the broad, common-sense, patriotic proposition that a sovereign nation has an absolute right to protect its sovereignty. And yet this is a proposition, let me suggest, that the Supreme Court of the United States has never lost sight of. At every great crisis in our national history, when it was proposed to take some step which had not been taken before, but upon which the continued progress and prosperity, and perhaps the very life, of the nation depended, there have always been timorous or short-sighted counselors who sought to prevent the step by blocking the way with the Constitution.

It is enough to cite the constitutional objections that were raised to the purchase of Louisiana, to the greenback act, to the credit-strengthening act, to the proposal to hold the islands acquired from Spain as territory, and not as a Territory of the United States. But the Supreme Court has always vindicated the sovereignty of the United States. It has always held that whatever act was essential to and inherent in national sovereignty could be properly exercised by this nation. Why should we fear, then, that this great tribunal would now deny to the nation the very first and highest right of sovereignty, the right to protect the life of its Chief Executive, the right to preserve the orderly administration of its affairs?

Does anyone imagine that the Supreme Court would quibble and haggle and split hairs when the question before it was one of inherent national right? If this amendment should prevail and an assault should be committed upon some future President, and the assailant should allege as his defense that he committed the assault at a time when the President was not engaged in the performance of his duty, does anybody believe for a single moment that the Supreme Court would recognize the validity of such defense and declare that Congress had exceeded its powers in attempting to protect the President at all times? The President can not always be engaged in the actual performance of his duty. He must eat and drink and take his recreation as other men. But can it be insisted that there is any time when his death would not disturb the machinery of government and bring anguish to the people?

Let it be remembered always that it is the Government of the United States, the free institutions which we have builded here, and not merely the life of a man, that we are endeavoring by this bill to protect. Was it any less an assault on these institutions that Abraham Lincoln was shot at a theater; that James A. Garfield was struck down as he was departing upon a journey of pleasure and recreation; that William McKinley was treacherously murdered while extending the hand of friendship and good will to his fellow-citizens in a city far distant from the seat of government? Not one of these men could by any reasonable construction of language be said to have been engaged in the performance of his duties at the moment chosen by the assassin to take his life; and yet who can deny that the assault upon them in each instance was just as much an attack upon the Government and just as great a shock to the orderly administration of the nation's business as if the fatal shot had broken in upon the very midst of an Executive act?

The President can not be always in the performance of his duty, but his duty is always upon him, and whoever makes impossible his performance of to-morrow's duty commits as great a crime as he who strikes him down with to-day's duty half fulfilled. Strike out from this first section the words, "while he is engaged in the performance of his official duties, or because of his official character, or because of his official acts or omissions," and you leave to the Supreme Court no task except to declare whether or not this nation has a right to punish an offense against its official head—a right which is of the very essence of national sovereignty, and which it is inconceivable to me could ever be denied. Leave these words in, and you not only suggest to the man who assaults the President the line of his defense, but you impose upon the court the determination of questions of motive, about which there can always be endless quibbling and contention.

Leave these words in and you warn the would-be assassin that he must commit the assault at some time when the President is taking his rest or his recreation, and that he must allege as a reason for it some private grievance wholly outside of the President's official acts, omissions, or character. Why go to such length to make it easy for the man who commits the greatest crime possible to any human being to escape punishment? I agree perfectly with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. POWERS] that any man capable of committing so great a crime is not likely to be deterred by the severity of the penalty, and that the greatest good we hope to accomplish by the passage of this measure is its moral effect. That being true and conceded, let us give it the greatest possible moral effect by making its terms direct and unequivocal. Let us declare, without condition or qualification, that the life of the President during his entire term of office belongs to the nation: that it is in the nation's keeping; that an attack upon it is a crime against the nation which the nation's courts will surely and swiftly and severely punish.

While I very earnestly hope, therefore, that the qualifying words in section 1, and wherever they occur in subsequent sections, may be stricken out, yet whether they are or not, I shall most cordially support this bill. I disagree utterly with the declaration of my friend from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] that this bill is the "inconsiderate outcome of hysteria" rather than the product of cool deliberation and the triumph of wise statesmanship. The people of the United States do not become hysterical, Mr. Chairman, but they do sometimes become terribly in earnest. This bill is here, it is true, in response to a popular demand; but that demand springs not from hysteria or fear.

It is the expression of a grim, resolute, and well-considered determination that this nation must be liberated, if liberation is possible, from the noisome and alien breed of anarchy; liberated from the terror by night, from the pestilence that walketh in darkness, from the destruction that wasteth at noonday. Not for the fear that anarchy may overthrow government; not for the fear that so many wise and great may fall at the hand of the assassin that none shall be left wise and great enough to administer the affairs of state; but because the people have a right to the life and service of those whom they choose to execute their will, and because the men thus chosen have the right to feel that no extraordinary danger hangs over their heads.

I can not see in this measure, Mr. Chairman, any menace to free speech or free press or to the exercise of any other right guaranteed us in the Constitution. A hundred years of self-government has made it easy for us to draw the line between legitimate criticism of public officials and public policies and seditious assault upon the Government itself. That line must be drawn. The law is for the lawless, and those who are law abiding need not fear it. The law against larceny does not harm the man who does not steal.

A law which closes the gates of Castle Garden against an avowed anarchist, which drives from our borders those already here, which prohibits the utterance of an anarchistic speech or the publication of anarchistic literature, and which punishes with death an attack upon the life of the President or anyone in line of succession to him, will put no restraint upon the man who has not treason and murder in his heart.

Let us write such a law upon our statute books; let us serve notice that this nation will defend itself no less against the bullet of the secret assassin than against the guns of the open enemy. Nothing less will be the measure of our duty; nothing less will meet the patriotic demand and the just expectation of the people. [Loud applause.]

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to congratulate the committee upon the fact that this debate upon the pending question is the first illustration in my Congressional experience of debate in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union being confined to the question pending before the committee. It has been suggested as a reflection upon this body that it had ceased to be a deliberative body. I also congratulate the committee upon the fact that this debate has demonstrated that the House still is a deliberative body, because the debate has not only been confined to the pending question, but it has been full, clear, able, and complete, and every member of the House who has desired to express an opinion upon this question has had full opportunity to do so. And it simply illustrates that it is always within the power of the House to thus conduct itself in a purely deliberative manner, notwithstanding the rules of the House, against which some of us sometimes inveigh. Upon every question this course could be pursued if the committee so desired. This would lead to a better attendance on the committee, as in such case the members might well expect to get some information on pending questions. On the contrary, however, the practice has become well-nigh universal, when in Committee of the Whole, to ignore the question and discuss everything from the precession of the equinoxes to the wherefore of the aurora borealis. The result is a lack of interest, no debate, no attendance, no benefit.

I perhaps may make here a personal digression. I desire to say that, so far as I am concerned, I have never been oppressed, depressed, compressed, or suppressed [laughter] by either the Speaker or the Committee on Rules. I have felt obliged on some occasions in my legislative capacity to differ from the Speaker and the Committee on Rules; and it may be fair for me to go further and say that, notwithstanding that fact, I have always been treated by the Speaker and the Committee on Rules like a gentleman; and I hope I have been able to reciprocate in kind. So that personally I have no complaint to make of any of the rules of the House. I have not found them interfering with or impeding myself in the discharge of my humble duties as the representative of my constituents.

The widespread and general dissemination, without control or regulation, of the anarchistic doctrines of assassination and murder that culminated in the foul, wicked, and infamous assassination of William McKinley, of saintly memory, not only profoundly moved mankind the world around, but attracted the attention of all civilized countries to the existence of the propaganda of attack upon organized government by the murder of its official head. It directed the attention of our own people to the question as to whether or not it was possible for the great legislative body of this nation to place upon the statute books any legislation that would at least tend in some degree to more adequately protect the officers of the Government and correct this crying public evil. In response to these suggestions many bills were introduced by the members of this House and referred to the Judiciary Committee. The Judiciary Committee began early its investigation of this question and its consideration of these various measures.

I concur most fully in the suggestion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH] that during my short experience, while I have had the honor to be a member of this great committee, there is no question that has received at the hands of this committee the careful deliberation, the full investigation that this measure has received, which has been reported to the House. The committee felt, and I now feel, that it was its duty when these new propositions were suggested for its consideration, to examine not only the Constitution, but the law of the land, the decisions of the courts, in order that the committee might report as the result of its deliberations not alone a wise, conservative, judicious measure, but one that would be clearly within constitutional limitations.

Now, the question before the committee is this: The Senate has passed a bill and has sent it to the House. It came before the Judiciary Committee. The gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] is not entirely correct in stating that the House bill is better, in his opinion, because of more delay and deliberation and is of a more conservative tone by reason of the delay, because really the committee on the part of the House reported this bill to the House, if I remember correctly, some time before the Senate committee even reported its bill to the Senate. The Senate bill was finally presented to the House and referred to the Judiciary Committee, and that committee reported the Senate bill back with the recommendation that the bill of the committee be substituted for the Senate bill, and a little later I purpose calling attention to the considerations which led the committee to take this course. I full well appreciate and understand that this is a question about which not only lawyers, but laymen, may intelligently and honestly differ.

The committee feels that it has recommended to the House the proper legislation. The committee does not feel that its deliberations are binding upon this House. The committee does hope that when the House fully understands this question and appreciates the work that the committee has done that the House will at least feel that the committee has made an effort to thoroughly, faithfully, honestly, intelligently, and patriotically investigate these questions and then give to the House the results of its investigation. And I wish to say this: Every member of this committee, although two of the committee do not agree with the balance of us upon the committee, but every man upon this committee, in my judgment, has been actuated by the same honest and patriotic motives. It is hardly to be expected, perhaps, that 17 men might unite upon a new and difficult legal proposition.

I purpose directing my discussion of this bill to the jurisdictional phase of it, and I may say here that the principal reason why the committee does not believe that the Senate bill should be adopted is because in its first section, in two important particulars, the committee believes it to be unconstitutional. I have said that the committee may be wrong, but we think we are right, and I will do the best I can in the time allotted to me to try and give the House the reasons, so far as they have not already been given—and they have been very ably given by the chairman of the committee—why we take this view; but in two important features, we think, in the jurisdictional part of the bill the Senate bill is unconstitutional. We believe that the House bill is within safe constitutional limitations.

The committee feels and I feel that upon a new question like this it is the duty of this committee to give to this House a measure that it believes and knows to be within constitutional limitations, and it is its duty not to give to this House nor to recommend to this House a measure that is of doubtful constitutionality, assuming it to be doubtful, or which may be in the nature of a legislative guess as to what the courts may hereafter hold, because later, when time shall test this measure, no matter what view we may take of this legislation from its practical standpoint, every man and every lawyer in this body wants to feel that he has voted for a sound constitutional proposition. He does not want to take any chances upon the construction that the court may be called upon hereafter to make.

Every lawyer on the committee believes that the committee's bill with its definitions of jurisdiction is constitutional, with one exception, perhaps, and I desire to state this fairly, and I want to say here I have no motive in stating any of these questions other than fairly. I shall esteem it a kindness if any member of this House at any time while I am discussing this question finds himself confronted with anything that he does not understand or with any question he desires to have answered will interrupt me and I will be only too glad to make answer if I am able to. I will do the best I can. It is the duty of a committee whose members stand upon this floor supporting an important bill to give to the House freely and fairly and frankly all the information it has upon questions of rights and questions of law. Now, that I will try to do.

I say every man upon the committee, with the possible exception of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS], concedes that the committee bill is constitutional. I think the gentleman from Wisconsin does say that in his judgment we reach the limit of constitutional power when we protect the lives of the President and Vice-President, and that we have no power to go further. We have three great departments of the Government, the executive, the legislative, and the judicial, and from the standpoint of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS] we have no power to protect the legislative coordinate branch, we have no power to protect the judicial coordinate branch, and we have no power to protect the great executive branch except at its head; but the vast army of officers, from the President away down through to the humblest officer, all of whom constitute and make a part of that coordinate branch known as the executive, and all of whom are essential to the exercise of the powers and the discharge of the functions of the Federal Government, those men my friend from Wisconsin feels that we have not the power to protect, and the only power that the great Government of the United States has is to protect simply two officers connected with its executive coordinate branch. The legislative branch might be destroyed, the judicial branch might be destroyed, and all of the executive branch destroyed except the President and Vice-President, and yet the Republic is paralyzed in its power to protect its existence and its operations as a Government, because, as my friend says, we can not go beyond the President and Vice-President.

Well, now, the committee do not agree with the gentleman from Wisconsin. We do not feel that we are hampered by that limitation. We are not so "cabined, cribbed, and confined." The matter has been discussed by every gentleman upon the committee, and the committee does not divide upon political ground, and I have this to say—and it ought to be said, because some suggestion has been made in relation to politics in connection with the bill—I ought to say that the Democrats upon this committee, in the subcommittee and in the full committee, labored as long and as zealously, as intelligently and as patriotically in perfecting this measure as did the Republicans. The distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] who, if his deserts receive their just reward, will go up higher when he leaves this House—and I am very glad to know that such undoubtedly will be the fact—although he does not believe in the policy or the wisdom or necessity of this measure, gave us in the committee the benefit of his great intelligence and learning in perfecting the terms of the bill—in getting it into legal and proper constitutional shape.

Under these circumstances, gentlemen, we come before this House and propose to leave with you the results of our work. What is the first great distinction between the two bills? The Senate bill is unconstitutional, first, because it prohibits the killing of the President and other officers without any limitations, qualifications, or restrictions. The House bill contains three express limitations, prescribing, as we believe—and of course we may be wrong—prescribing, as we believe, the limits of our constitutional power. What are they? That the President must be in the performance of duties of his office, or the killing must be by reason of his official character, or it must be because of some act or omission of his. Now, there is a part of the distinction between the two bills.

The Senate bill is unlimited, without any restriction or condition whatever. It is sought to justify the Senate bill by the clause of the Constitution, and I am very glad to call attention to it for a moment—the clause that authorizes Congress to enact all necessary and proper laws to carry into effect the foregoing powers. I read now from the remarks of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS]. He quoted the great case of McCullough v. Maryland, one of the early cases defining the constitutional limitations of power, the opinion being written by that architect of the Constitution, that supreme man in laying down the law of the land, Chief Justice Marshall. Chief Justice Marshall in reference to that clause of the Constitution said this:

In order to determine as to the power of Congress, let the end be legitimate—

Now, mark you—let it be within the scope of the Constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end—which are not prohibited, but consistent with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, are constitutional.

Now, mark again—

Now, I submit this to the committee. It hardly does for a lawyer, talking to lawyers, to stand here and say that the Constitution says that we can pass all laws necessary and proper, and it is necessary and proper that the President should be protected, and therefore we can protect him at all times, under all circumstances, in all places. Why? Because Mr. Chief Justice Marshall said that we could pass all laws that were "necessary and proper," and what? And "within the scope of the Constitution." Simply to say that they are necessary and proper, and that the purpose is necessary and proper, carries you nowhere. You reach no result. As a matter of logical reasoning you have demonstrated nothing. You have demonstrated no proposition until you have gone further and demonstrated that your proposed law is "within the scope of the Constitution."

Now note, gentlemen, and when I make this statement I do not desire to misquote any gentleman. I have listened to all this debate. I have heard every speech, and I have admired the ability displayed on this floor. I have admired the interest that members have taken, and the desire which they have manifested to perfect this measure. The committee welcome that. The committee welcome criticism from any quarter. The committee do not pretend, or at least I do not pretend, to be infallible upon propositions of this kind. I give the House the best I can give them. I am ready to hear from any member of the House, however humble he may be, upon any of these propositions; any suggestion he may have to make, because I do not deny that he may be able to give light upon them.

Mr. OLMSTED. Then I would like to make a suggestion or at least ask the gentleman a question as to the use and the meaning of this word "knowingly."

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Will the gentleman pardon me? If he will call my attention to that after the discussion of the constitutional question——

Mr. OLMSTED. I think this comes in on the point where you are.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. It carries me off the line of my argument, and I ask the gentleman to please withhold that for the present.

Mr. OLMSTED. I think it is right in that line.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I am discussing the jurisdictional definition.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I do not want to interrupt you, but I should like to ask you a question.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I would rather not, unless it is on the question I am discussing now. It does not interfere, but I suggest this: I am discussing now the jurisdictional features of the bill, and unless the gentleman's question relates to that, I would rather he would waive it and call my attention to it later, because I would like to get clearly before the House the views of the committee upon this jurisdictional question.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Will the gentleman state what constitutional warrant the committee found for the provision against offenses committed against foreign governments?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I will reach that a little later, if the gentleman will call my attention to it then.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I should like to ask the gentleman this question, if he will yield.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. If the President's duties are absolutely successive for years and continuous, I do not understand why it is that you contend that Congress has not the same power to protect the people in the right to have him perform his duty that is to be done to-morrow the same as the official duty he is performing to-day.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Well, I do not know whether I will be able to clear that up satisfactorily to my friend, but I will do the best I can, and if I do not succeed in throwing any light upon it I will be willing to hear the suggestions of the gentleman on this proposition; but I think I will reach that before I conclude.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. An inquiry on the jurisdictional question.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Will the gentleman excuse me? Will it suit the gentleman's purpose just as well to wait until I finish my argument upon this branch of the constitutional question?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Certainly.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I think that would be more satisfactory to the House and myself also, and I will be very glad to answer the gentleman's question then. I was making this suggestion: I think that the suggestion made by my friends who believe that the committee's bill does not go far enough could be fairly summarized in this declaration—that it is necessary to properly protect the President, and therefore we have the power to enact the necessary and proper laws for that purpose. My answer is simply this: They must go further and demonstrate that their law is within the scope of the Conititution. This they have not done. I think I have stated in a general way the proposition we are undertaking to maintain.

How do we meet the question? The committee says first, and as has been suggested by my distinguished friend from Texas, that this is a dual government, with a State jurisdiction and a Federal jurisdiction. There is a peace of the State and a peace of the United States. There is a State power and a Federal power. State duties and functions and Federal duties and functions. Each jurisdiction is exclusive and supreme within its legitimate scope, and neither can nor does infringe upon the other. Citizens are subject to the State jurisdiction and are protected in the exercise of their rights and privileges as such by State legislation. It is the addition of the Federal official function that entitles them to the protection of the Federal power and that authorized the assertion of power for that purpose. We have full common-law jurisdiction in the States. There is no common-law criminal jurisdiction in the United States. The only power that we get for the enactment of criminal legislation by the Federal Congress is a constructive power.

There is no affirmative language in the Constitution that authorizes the enactment of a statute making any offense a crime against the Federal law. It exists only by reason of the inherent power of the Government of the United States to secure the execution of its laws, the protection of the Government, and the performance of their powers and functions by its officials, in order that the Government may be carried on. That is the limitation, that is the inherent power that authorizes the enactment of any Federal legislation making offenses a crime.

Hence is derived the power to protect its officers in the exercise of those powers and the discharge of those functions; in other words, in the discharge of their duties.

It can protect the government from any attacks made upon it by assaults upon its officials by reason of their official capacity.

To this extent its criminal jurisdiction by construction extends so far as its officers are concerned.

Beyond these limits it does not go, because the necessity which justifies the assertion of the jurisdiction does not exist beyond these limits. For these contingencies the bill in terms expressly provides.

The question is whether the bill of the committee comes within these essential limitations. Upon this line I wish to call attention here to the fact, because it tends to sustain the theory of the committee's bill, that this legislation is not, as suggested by my friend from Texas, a new departure. It is not by any means the first time the United States has exercised this constructive jurisdiction by declaring offenses against officials in the discharge of their duties to be a crime against Federal law. My friend quoted—and it indicated well his research—a statute passed in 1790 defining murder in the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States. In the very same Congress, in 1790, on April 30, the President approved a statute, found in the Revised Statutes as section 5398, which imposed a penalty upon every person—who knowingly and willfully obstructs, resists, or opposes any officer of the United States in serving or attempting to serve or execute any mesne process or warrant, or any rule or order of any court of the United States, or any other legal or judicial writ or process, or assaults, beats, or wounds any officer or other person duly authorized in serving or executing any writ, rule, order, process, or warrant, etc.

So that at the very threshold, at the beginning, the Government began exercising this constructive power to protect its officers in the discharge of their duties. Now, I hold in my hand an abstract of all the legislation of this Government upon this line, wherever they have undertaken to exercise this constructive power in connection with its officers. I will quote them in their chronological order:

Act of March 3, 1863 (12 Stat., 731), an act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes.

SEC. 25. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall resist any draft of men enrolled under this act into the service of the United States, or shall counsel or aid any person to resist any such draft, or shall assault or obstruct any officer in making such draft or in the performance of any service in relation thereto, or shall counsel any person to assault or obstruct any such officer, or shall counsel any drafted men not to appear at the place of rendezvous, or willfully dissuade them from the performance of military duty as required by law, such person shall be subject to summary arrest by the provost-marshal, and shall be forthwith delivered to the civil authorities, and upon conviction thereof be punished by a fine not exceeding $500, or by imprisonment not exceeding two years, or by both of such punishments.

SEC. 5447. Every person who forcibly assaults, resists, opposes, prevents, impedes, or interferes with any officer of customs or his deputy, or any person assisting him, in the execution of his duties, or any person authorized to make searches or seizures, in the execution of his duty, or who rescues or attempts to rescue, or causes to be rescued any property which has been seized by any person so authorized, or who, before, at, or after such seizure, in order to prevent the seizure or securing of any goods, wares, or merchandise by any person so authorized, staves, breaks, throws overboard, destroys, or removes the same, shall be fined not less than $100 nor more than $2,000, or be imprisoned not less than one month nor more than one year, or both; and every person who discharges any deadly weapon at any person authorized to make searches or seizures, or uses any deadly or dangerous weapon in resisting him in the execution of his duty, with intent to commit a bodily injury upon him, or to deter or prevent him from discharging his duty, shall be imprisoned at hard labor for a term not more than ten years or less than one year. (Approved July 18, 1866.)

SEC. 5516. Every person who willfully obstructs, hinders, or prevents any officer or other person charged with the execution of any warrant or process issued under the provisions of sections 1984 and 1985, title "Civil Rights," or any person lawfully assisting him, from arresting any person for whose apprehension a warrant or process may have been issued; or rescues or attempts to rescue such person from the custody of the officer or other person lawfully assisting when so arrested pursuant to the authority herein given; or aids, abets, or assists any person so arrested to escape from the custody of the officer or other person legally authorized to arrest the party; or harbors or conceals any person for whose arrest a warrant or process has been issued, so as to prevent his discovery and arrest, after notice or knowledge of the fact that a warrant has been issued for the apprehension of such person, shall, for any such offense, be subject to a fine of not more than $1,000, or imprisonment not more than six months, or both. (Approved May 31, 1870.)

SEC. 5522. Every person, whether with or without any authority, power or process, or pretended authority, power or process, of any State, Territory, or municipality, who obstructs, hinders, assaults, or by bribery, solicitation or otherwise, interferes with or prevents the supervisors of election, or either of them, or the marshal or his general or special deputies, or either of them, in the performance of any duty required of them, or either of them, or which he or they, or either of them, may be authorized to perform by any law of the United States, in the execution of process or otherwise, or by any of the means above mentioned hinders or perverts the free attendance and presence at such places of registration or at such polls of election, or full and free access and egress to and from such place of registration or poll of election, or in going to and from any such place of registration or poll of election, or to and from any room where any such registration or election or canvass of votes, or of making any returns or certificates thereof, may be had, or who molests, interferes with, removes, or ejects from any such place of registration or poll of election, or of canvassing of votes cast thereat, or of making returns or certificates thereof, any supervisor of election, the marshal or his general or special deputies, or either of them, or who threatens or attempts, or offers to do so, or refuses or neglects to aid or assist any supervisor of election, or the marshal or his general or special deputies, or either of them, in the performance of his or their duties, when required by him or them, or either of them, to give such aid and assistance, shall be liable to instant arrest without process, and shall be punished by imprisonment not more than two years, or by a fine of not more than $3,000, or by both such fine and imprisonment, and shall pay the cost of his prosecution.

SEC. 5472. Any person who shall rob any carrier, agent, or other person intrusted with the mail, of such mail, or any part thereof, shall be punishable by imprisonment at hard labor for not less than five years and not more than ten years; and if convicted a second time of a like offense, or if, in effecting such robbery the first time, the robber shall wound the person having custody of the mail, or put his life in jeopardy by the use of dangerous weapons, such offender shall be punishable by imprisonment at hard labor for the term of his natural life.

SEC. 5473. Any person who shall attempt to rob the mail by assaulting the person having custody thereof, shooting at him or his horse, or threatening him with dangerous weapons, and shall not effect such robbery, shall be punishable by imprisonment at hard labor for not less than two years and not more than ten years.

(Approved June 8, 1872.)
SEC. 3869. Every person who willfully and maliciously injures, tears down, or destroys any letter box, pillar box, or other receptacle established by the Postmaster-General for the safe deposit of matter for the mail or for delivery, or who willfully and maliciously assaults any letter carrier, when in uniform, while engaged on his route in the discharge [of his duty as a letter carrier, and every person who willfully aids or assists therein, shall for every such offense be punishable by a fine of not less than $100, and not more than $1,000, or by imprisonment for not less than one year and not more than three. (Approved June 8, 1872.)

Mr. CRUMPACKER. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Has there ever been any legislation protecting the President of the United States from interference in the discharge of any of his official duties?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That comes to a question whether there is any precise precedent for this. Congress has never undertaken such extensive unlimited power. No; I do not think that there is.

Mr. RAY of New York. I beg the gentleman's pardon, but the gentleman from Maine just read one statute where it says "any officer of the United States."

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That is true; but I thought the gentleman from Indiana meant the President specifically.

Mr. RAY of New York. It says "any officer of the United States."

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Oh, yes; I understood the gentleman from Indiana to ask if the President of the Uuited States was mentioned by name.

Mr. RAY of New York. The President is an officer of the United States, and is included in that term; it takes in every officer.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. In view of the statement of the gentleman from New York, I would like to ask him is there any or has there been any legislation during the history of this country that would punish any interference with the President of the United States in the discharge of the functions of his office?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Eo nomine?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. No; by interpretation. Is there any statute that would cover the President of the United States to protect him against the interference in the discharge of his official duty?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I will say that I doubt very much if there is, except by a very strained construction.

Mr. LANHAM. I think that is true. Now, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. LANHAM. In any of the instances the gentleman from Maine has cited, in the statutes to which he has referred, is there any legislation proposed where the Federal Government takes cognizance of a crime involving the personal violence within the limits of the State?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Oh, yes; these statutes nearly all relate to Federal officers operating within the limits of a State.

Mr. LANHAM. Yes; but they refer to obstructions or the resistence to the processes of officers of the United States; but I mean for any crime like personal violence—assault and battery or murder?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. No; that specific, distinct crime that the gentleman refers to is not covered by these statutes.

Mr. LANHAM. So that the point I make is that this is a new departure.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. In that respect it is a new departure, and I will have occasion to call attention to it when I read from the decisions of the court in the case of Yarborough in the United States Court Reports. I will show that the new departure is justified by reason of the fact which the committee believe, with all due respect to my friend from Texas, that there to-day exists an exigency that properly requires the exercise of this power, although heretofore it may not have been exercised.

The history of this legislation has been that in the experience of the Government in the development of its history that whenever under the circumstances necessity for legislation of this kind existed Congress has always responded with the legislation.

Beginning with 1790, and then in 1863, 1871, and 1872, step by step and so on as the exigencies have arisen, Congress has risen to the occasion and passed the legislation. And now we think that circumstances exist and exigencies have arisen which should call into exercise by legislation this power which has lain dormant during the history of the Republic.

I want to say this, so far as the gentleman from Indiana is concerned, that I shall not contend and I do not contend that there is any decided case that stands on all fours with the proposition suggested by the Senate bill, because the Congress of the United States has never yet assumed such power—and that is a fact of some significance—in any of these instances where legislation has been passed. If the theory of the Senate bill is sound it would have been entirely competent for the Government to have provided against assaults on officers without reference to what they were doing or where they were, or to its effect upon the operations of the Government. It would have been entirely competent to punish such assaults; but it is significant, it is worth something, it is entitled to some force, that never before now has it ever been attempted to reach out and exercise this broad, general, and unlimited jurisdiction and protect the officer simply because he was an officer, independent of the consequences and independent of the question as to whether the assault was made upon him by reason of his official character.

Of course there could not be any case precisely in point. But it is not the purpose of cases that have been decided by the courts to enable a lawyer to take down books from his shelves and find cases on all fours with and fitting exactly the case before him. This is not necessary in order that he may reach a conclusion as to the state of the law. This suggestion that there is no specific case in point reminds me of a gentleman who practiced law in my vicinity and who was what is known as a "case lawyer," and I wish to show what was his conception as to the use which was to be made of adjudicated cases. A client came into his office one day and inquired whether or not he had a perfect title to a calf that was in controversy. My friend, who was a "case lawyer" and who had a large library, took down his books and began looking over them to see whether there was any other calf in the books. Unfortunately for his client he could not discover another calf in the books. So he shut them up in derision, and when his client called again he informed him that "there was no law on calves." He had not found any specific identical case agreeing absolutely with the one in hand. That incident may serve to illustrate the idea of some gentlemen that we must find in this instance a case exactly parallel which has been decided by the courts.

The purpose of precedents and decisions of the courts is not necessarily to furnish cases that are on all fours with cases that may subsequently arise that rest upon the same facts. That is not a scientific conception of the law—that is not the way in which the law is scientifically investigated. The real purpose of decisions and conclusions of the courts is to ascertain the principles upon which cases have been decided, which, when ascertained and declared, may be subsequently applied to other conditions and other facts when they arise. It is the ascertainment, declaration, and application of fundamental principles declared and announced by the courts in accordance with the perfection of human reason that dignifies the great profession to which we belong as one of the noblest professions in the world. This involves the exercise of reason.

Now, although there is not any case precisely in point, precisely deciding this specific matter in specific language, I hope to be able to satisfy this committee that the canons of constitutional construction as laid down by the courts in other cases govern and control this proposition here; and if so, wisdom and caution and conservatism requires us to adopt the conclusions of the committee.

Before reaching the discussion of these cases, I want to call attention to one suggestion which has been made here and made with a good deal of force. It is not necessary to undertake to "whistle down the wind" any suggestion which may be made upon either side of a great question as important as this is. It is suggested that the President has vested in him the executive power under the Constitution, and therefore occupies a different position legally from any other executive officer. There is force in this suggestion.

The Constitution does provide that in the President shall be vested the executive power. But the Constitution does not provide that the President is that coordinate branch of the Government called the Executive. The very same article of the Constitution which provides that the executive power shall be vested in the President provides also that the President may call for the opinion of the head of each of the Executive Departments. The Constitution in express terms contemplates, not that the President is all that there is of the executive department, but recognizes that there are heads of the Executive Departments; that the executive powers extend beyond the President of the United States. He holds the greatest office, the most dignified, the most honorable in the world—a position upon which are imposed more duties and in which is vested more power than in any other officer known to the Constitution and laws. But that does not demonstrate that there is any distinction in law, in legal character, between his office and the great army of subordinate officers who are called executive officers and without whom the functions of the Government could not be discharged.

If it were true that the President of the United States himself is eo nomine this coordinate branch of the Government—and there is force in the suggestion at first blush—if that were true, I submit whether or not the killing of the President of the United States would not for the time being obliterate the executive part of the Government. But does it do so? The killing of the President of the United States does not for one moment hinder the discharge, except so far as he is personally concerned, of any of the executive functions of the Government.

It was the highest tribute ever paid to American institutions and constitutional government when it appeared that even the death of William McKinley at Buffalo never for a moment disturbed the discharge of the executive duties upon the part of any executive officer. Had the President been himself the source and inspiration of all executive power, the killing of William McKinley would have destroyed for the time being the executive branch of the Government. But as James A. Garfield well said at the time of the assassination of President Lincoln—and this illustrates the legal propriety of the declaration—"God reigns, and the Government still lives." The great army of executive officers still went on in the exercise of their powers and the discharge of their duties. There was not even a tremble in the executive functions.

For this reason it seems to me, Mr. Chairman—I may be wrong about it—that the same legal considerations apply to one office that apply to the other. Practical considerations, political considerations, sentimental considerations are transcendentally annexed to the office of the President as compared with others below him in the Executive Departments.

Mr. BROMWELL. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question at this point?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. BROMWELL. As I understand it, the argument of the gentleman is that the destruction of the President alone would not be a blow at the executive branch of the Government?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Not entirely.

Mr. BROMWELL. Because there is some one provided for by the Constitution who is to succeed him, and those successors are provided for by law. Now, let us imagine a case which is possible. It may be a remote contingency, but let us suppose that the President, Vice-President, and all the others who are provided for by law as successors should in one conspiracy, as it were, say in a railroad train or at a public meeting, be assassinated. Then there is no one provided for by law to succeed to the executive branch of the Government. Will the gentleman elucidate his views as to the condition of affairs under such a contingency as that, which is entirely possible?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Certainly, and I am very glad to have the gentleman make the suggestion. I do not rest my proposition upon that sole ground. If I did, there would be considerable force in the suggestion of the gentleman. It is true that in case of the death of the President there are now in existence, ready to take up the discharge of his duties simply by taking an oath, at least half a dozen officers in the line of succession, but of course, when exhausted, you would have the condition of hiatus suggested by my friend from Ohio; but I go further than that. The President, the Vice-President, the members of the Cabinet are not the only executive officers. For instance, the President is mentioned in the Constitution, and, by the way, that is the suggestion of my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS] and where his line of demarcation was drawn. He excludes the others, because they are not mentioned by name; but the Speaker of the House of Representatives is mentioned by name, the President pro tempore of the Senate is mentioned by name, the Senators are mentioned by name, and the Representatives and the judges of the Supreme Court, all of whom he would eliminate; but I go further. I say that below the President and the Vice-President and Cabinet officers there is a vast army who are also executive officers.

Mr. BROMWELL. But can any of those executive officers fill the office of President?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Not at all.

Mr. REEVES. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. REEVES. If I gather the force of the gentleman's argument, it is this, in a word, and I wish to restate it, that if the entire executive function was embodied in the President, then the difficulties of jurisdiction that the gentleman's committee has met with would not exist, and it might make a law or a statute punishing the assassin of the President because he was President. Did I catch the gentleman right?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. No; that is not my proposition.

Mr. REEVES. Pardon me just a moment, and I will not interrupt the gentleman again. I caught that as the spirit of the gentleman's argument, it being a jurisdictional one, and if that were true—and I make this suggestion for the further consideration of the gentleman—even though not all of the executive powers are vested in the President, still the striking down of the President would at least be a crippling of the executive powers of the executive branch, and if that were all vested in him and because of that you could punish the man for killing him, it would follow necessarily that if you partially destroyed them you could do it, legally and equitably, I think.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I do not concede; and if the gentleman will follow me as I go along, he will see that I do not think the authorities would sustain the proposition that even if the President was the sole Executive he could be protected beyond the discharge of his official duties or by reason of his official capacity—note that—or by reason of some act or omission of his. I think that is the definite limitation made by the courts as they lay down the canons of construction. The argument I have been trying to make—and I am glad the gentleman makes the suggestion, because I do not like to be misunderstood—is that there is no legal distinction between the lower office and the higher office. The President is at the head of the Executive Department, and a fourth-class postmaster may be at the foot. They are both a part of it. My purpose in making these suggestions is to try and demonstrate this and for the purpose of applying to this part of the question the cases I am going to cite construing statutes, in some instances relating to inferior offices; but in construing them the courts laid down fundamental propositions, canons of construction, and I shall try to show that in my judgment there is no legal distinction between the highest and the lowest, because they are all executive officers and essential parts of the Executive.

Mr. BROMWELL. If the full line of succession to the Presidency were wiped out, according to the suggestion of mine a while ago, in order that anyone else may exercise the office of President of the United States under the Constitution, Congress would have to legislate, and the President of the United States would have to sign a statute which provided for the succession. All persons who were competent to act with Congress in signing and approving any act that we could pass would have been wiped out. How could the legislative branch alone, under the Constitution, create an office or provide a successor for the Presidency, when all who are now provided for by law should have ceased to exist?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I do not know that we could.

Mr. BROMWELL. Then would there not be a hiatus in the Government——

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That might be so——

Mr. BROMWELL. Which would render our action absolutely void.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That might be so. Of course that is an extreme illustration. With the extreme and absolutely impossible illustration of the gentleman that might be so, and it may be that would demonstrate a casus omissus under those unsupposable circumstances that the gentleman refers to. I concede that, but it does not determine the question whether or not the jurisdiction of Congress in passing legislation is or is not circumscribed, in my judgment. Of course I am very glad to have the suggestion of the gentleman. Now, I wish to call attention briefly to some authorities that tend to establish the distinction between the State sovereignty and Federal sovereignty, State and Federal jurisdiction, and, as I submit, lay down this canon of construction. I will refer to some cases that have already been referred to.

In the case of the United States v. Cruikshank (92 U. S., 542–553), the court said, pages 553–554:

> The very highest duty of the States, when they entered into the Union under the Constitution, was to protect all persons within their boundaries in the enjoyment of these "unalienable rights with which they were endowed by their Creator." Sovereignty, for this purpose, rests alone with the States. It is no more the duty or within the power of the United States to punish for a conspiracy to falsely imprison or murder within a State than it would be to punish for false imprisonment or murder itself.

This clearly defines State sovereignty and states some of the limitations upon Federal sovereignty.

In the case of the United States v. Fox (95 U. S., 670–672) in the same line the court held:

> There is no doubt of the competency of Congress to provide by special penalties for the enforcement of all legislation—

Now, I wish the committee to mark this—> all legislation necessary or proper to the execution of powers with which it is intrusted.

> Any act committed with a view of evading the legislation of Congress passed in the execution of any of its powers, or of fraudulently securing the benefit of such legislation, may properly be made an offense against the United States. But an act committed within a State, whether for a good or a bad purpose, or whether with an honest or a criminal intent, can not be made an offense against the United States unless it have some relation to the execution of a power of Congress or to some matter within the jurisdiction of the United States. An act not having any such relation is one in respect to which the State can alone legislate—> unless it have some relation to the execution of a power of Congress or to some matter within the jurisdiction of the United States. An act not having any such relation is one in respect to which the State can alone legislate.

Unless what?—

What is the execution of a power by an official except the discharge of his duties?

Well, this lays it down in a general way; but we have another case which lays it down very much more definitely and specifically. Further along in the Cruikshank case the court held that the criterion to determine the jurisdiction was whether the officer was in the discharge of his duty. They say this:

> Thus if a marshal of the United States—

If I have established a parallel between the lowest and highest, this applies here—

Thus, if a marshal of the United States is unlawfully resisted while executing the process of the courts within a State, and the resistance is accompanied by assault on the officer, the sovereignty of the United States is violated—

By what?—

by the resistance, and that of the State by the breach of the peace in the assault.

And the court said substantially the same thing in Ex parte Yarborough (110 U. S., 657, 658):

It is very true that while Congress at an early day passed criminal laws to punish piracy with death, and for punishing all ordinary offenses against person and property committed within the District of Columbia, and in forts, arsenals, and other places within the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, it was slow to pass laws protecting officers of the Government from personal injuries inflicted while in discharge of their official duties within the States. This was not for want of power, but because no occasion had arisen which required such legislation, the remedies of the State courts for personal violence having proved sufficient.

Mr. REEVES. Will the gentleman pardon me again?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. REEVES. I do not want constantly to interrupt. Is not that decision from which you have read an interpretation of an existing statute?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes; but it lays down a rule of construction.

Mr. REEVES. But pardon me——

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes.

Mr. REEVES. It lays down a rule of construction of that statute?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. No.

Mr. REEVES. Oh, yes; pardon me.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Well, I do not agree with the gentleman.

Mr. REEVES. I do not agree with the gentleman.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. The court is construing that section. I do not wish to be offensive to the gentleman——

Mr. REEVES. No; certainly not.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. The court is construing a statute. I agree with the gentleman on that point. But the court does not confine the application of the rule laid down to that statute. They lay down a general principle and then try the particular statute by that principle. Now I come to the case of Ex parte Siebold.

Mr. LANHAM. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes.

Mr. LANHAM. The last decision you quoted, in the Cruikshank case, it is said that the sovereignty of the United States was violated by the resistance. The sovereignty of the State was violated by the assault. Suppose it had been a murder. Would not the sovereignty of the State have been violated in that case? Can not the State have jurisdiction of the murderer, notwithstanding there was resistance to some officer?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Undoubtedly the State would have had jurisdiction of the murderer. There is no question about that at all. These jurisdictions are unquestionably concurrent, operate at the same time and in the same place upon the same act.

Mr. RAY of New York. If my colleague will permit?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. RAY of New York. It is true that in that case the Supreme Court was determining whether or not a certain statute was constitutional, whether Congress had or had not gone beyond its constitutional power in enacting that statute. They were not construing that statute at all. The gentleman is mistaken. They were deciding whether or not an act passed by Congress was constitutional. Now, it became necessary for them to state and determine whether Congress had gone beyond its constitutional powers. Therefore it became necessary to determine what the power of Congress was in protecting its citizens and its officers; and so Chief Justice Waite defines there the power and jurisdiction of Congress in enacting just such statutes as we are trying to enact here, and uses that language in defining the jurisdiction and power of Congress and not in construing the statute. He was not construing it at all.

Mr. LANHAM. But he announced the indisputable proposition that the State had jurisdiction over the assault and person.

Mr. RAY of New York. He points out the distinction between the power of the State and that of the United States. He says that if an officer of the United States is assaulted while engaged in the performance of his duty that the jurisdiction and power of the State is offended against because of the assault, the assault and battery, but the jurisdiction of the United States is resisted and offended against because of the resistance to the officer.

Mr. LANHAM. I understand.

Mr. RAY of New York. And he then says the State may punish, the United States may punish, both for the same act, but it is not the same offense, and the ground upon which they are based is entirely different.

Mr. LANHAM. And yet the different jurisdictions are well defined.

Mr. RAY of New York. But the idea that the court is construing is incorrect. The court was determining whether the statute was constitutional and whether or not Congress has exceeded its powers.

Mr. REEVES. May I interrupt the gentleman for a moment?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. REEVES. The chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary has not only wiped me out but the gentleman who is addressing the House by his statement about the Supreme Court.

Mr. RAY of New York. If the gentleman will read he will see what I have stated is absolutely true.

Mr. REEVES. My friend will not assume that he is the only one who can read. Several of us have read that case with earnestness, and I am one of them; and I want to say to the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary that the Supreme Court was construing a statute in the quotation read by the gentleman addressing the House. That other views of the subject were considered in the same opinion is true, but in that part of the quotation that the gentleman read they were construing the statute, and that can not be gainsaid if you will look to the language quoted. It is so plain that any man can see it, and so being wiped off the map here with my friend——

Mr. RAY of New York. I wish to state that all they determined in that case was that the statute enacted by Congress was unconstitutional and void, because we had exceeded our power. Now, I ask my colleague from Maine whether that is not true?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That the court were construing a statute, and in construing that made these remarks I have quoted.

Mr. RAY of New York. Did not they determine it to be unconstitutional?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes.

Mr. RAY of New York. Was not that the question, whether or not it was constitutional?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That is true.

I do not understand that the gentleman from Illinois on this proposition is disturbed—at least I hope he is not any more disturbed by this than I am.

Mr. REEVES. Not in the least.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. If the committee please, I call attention to another case, in which the court was passing upon the constitutionality of a statute. Now, I want to say that in the heat of this argument I may be drastic in my statement, and if so I have no objection to any gentleman calling my attention to it. In the case of Ex parte Siebold (100 U. S., 394)—in this case the court were considering the constitutionality of a Federal election law. I wish to be thoroughly understood about this. They held it to be constitutional, and in holding it to be constitutional the questions involved here were discussed by the court, and I think—now, I may be wrong about this—but I know that in that discussion the court laid down the canon of constitutional construction in reference to this matter of Federal jurisdiction. The opinion was rendered by Mr. Justice Bradley, and it was afterwards cited and approved by Mr. Justice Miller. I do not make an extravagant statement when I say that Mr. Justice Miller is conceded to be at least one of the greatest constitutional lawyers that ever sat in the highest tribunal known to our law. And it is also cited with approval by my distinguished friend from Wisconsin; and although I no not agree with his legal views I do not take the ground that that dilutes the authority. I find it in his speech.

In this case, in the opinion of the court, Judge Bradley, discussing the constitutionality of the statute, held it constitutional, and in doing so the court used this language, referring to the question of unconstitutionality:

Somewhat akin to the argument which has been considered is the objection that the deputy marshals authorized by the act of Congress to be created and to attend the elections are authorized to keep the peace, and that this is a duty which belongs to the State authorities alone. It is argued that the preservation of peace and good order in society is not within the powers confided to the Government of the United States, but belongs exclusively to the States. Here again we are met with the theory that the Government of the United States does not rest upon the soil and the territory of the country. We think that this theory is founded on an entire misconception of the nature and powers of that Government.

Now we reach a proposition to which I would like the careful attention of the committee, because it lays down the canon of construction to which I have referred.

We hold it to be an incontrovertible principle that the Government of the United States may, by means of physical force, exercised through its official agents, execute on every foot of American soil the powers and functions that belong to it. This necessarily involves the power to command obedience to its laws, and hence the power to keep the peace to that extent.

Now, that sentence, "execute the powers and functions that belong to it" I call particular attention to. It does not say "be prepared to execute," it does not say be "charged with the power of executing." It says "the Government of the United States may, by means of physical force, exercised through its official agents, execute on every foot of American soil the powers and functions that belong to it." It does not relate to a passive but an active condition. In other words, discharge the duties vested in the official agents. Now, what does the court further say:

This necessarily involves the power to command obedience to its laws, and hence the power to keep the peace to that extent.

What does that language mean? "The power to keep the peace." What, generally? Indefinitely? At all times, under all circumstances? In all places, without any reference to qualification? No. "To that extent." To what extent? To the extent that these powers are exercised by official agents and may be executed on every foot of American soil—execute powers and functions that belong to the Government. In other words, to the extent that the officers of the Government discharge the duties of their office. Now it seems to me—and I submit this with all due humility and caution—it seems to me that the fair construction of that language defines exactly the limit of the constitutional power. It is not a construction of a statute, but I submit it lays down a broad fundamental rule of construction. With that rule standing in the face of the Judiciary Committee, announced by Mr. Justice Bradley, a very able lawyer, and concurred in by Justice Miller, the Judiciary Committee did not feel that they could report a bill that went beyond "that extent," because it seemed to them that, according to the fair ordinary reading and construction of language, that is what it meant.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. With pleasure.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I understand the decision that the gentleman has just read holds that the Federal Government has the right to enforce the law and protect its officers in the execution of the Federal powers. Now, let me ask the gentleman if it is not true that the Federal Government can only execute its powers through citizens who have been chosen to office.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. And if these citizens who have been chosen, while they occupy the office are assassinated, the Federal Government has no means of executing the powers and functions of that office?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. No; assuming they are all out.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Now, is not the gentleman forced to concede, under the doctrine of that case, that the Federal Government has the power to protect men who have been constitutionally selected to carry on its operations in order that it may carry out the functions for which it was created?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Not at all, because the court does not say so; the court does not so hold. The court expressly limits it to the power of executing the duties of the office.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. How can they when all the officers are assassinated?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. This is not a question of being charged with the duty; it is the actual discharge of the duty.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The gentleman then admits that the Government has not the inherent power to preserve its own existence and protect its constitutional agents through which it must execute its laws.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I beg the gentleman's pardon. My attention was just called away by the gentleman from New York, and I lost the thread of the gentleman's conundrum.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The gentleman from Maine says that he admits that a condition of things may exist in regard to the executive officers where they might all be assassinated and the Government would be without any means of enforcing these laws, and yet he insists the Government has no power to protect these officers in regard to preserving the constitutional means of enforcing its laws and carrying on its operations?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Now, I will tell the gentleman what I mean. I mean that the court here says that this jurisdiction is limited to the execution of the official function of the officer; the court said that it can not be extended beyond that. I mean that if the proposition of the gentleman from Indiana is sound, there is no sense whatever in this proposition laid down by the court; there was no occasion to lay it down. It is "full of sound and fury, signifying nothing;" because, if the Federal Government has power to protect its officers at all times, here and everywhere, without reference to whether they are discharging their official duties, whether they are awake or asleep, whether they are at work or otherwise—how idle it was for Mr. Justice Bradley and Mr. Justice Miller to carefully and after great consideration impose express limitations upon a power which, on the theory of the gentleman from Indiana, is absolutely unlimited.

I would be more than glad, as far as I am concerned, and every man on the Judiciary Committee would be more than glad, if we could feel it safe for the Government to exercise in this respect an unlimited power, when Mr. Justice Bradley and Mr. Justice Miller have expressly imposed limitations upon that specific power. But we do not think we would be discharging our duties as a great committee of this House in recommending legislation in the teeth of those express limitations, as declared by those two eminent justices.

Let me enforce and emphasize the distinction by quoting a little further the remarks of Mr. Justice Bradley:

This power to enforce its laws and execute its functions in all places does not derogate from the power of the State to execute its laws at the same time and in the same places. The one does not exclude the other except where both can not be executed at the same time. In that case the words of the Constitution itself show which is to yield. "This Constitution and all laws which shall be made in pursuance thereof * * * shall be the supreme law of the land."

This concurrent jurisdiction which the National Government necessarily possesses to exercise its powers of sovereignty in all parts of the United States is distinct from that exclusive power which, by the first article of the Constitution, it is authorized to exercise over the District of Columbia and within those places within a State which are purchased by consent of the legislature thereof, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dockyards, and other needful buildings. There its jurisdiction is absolutely exclusive of that of the State, unless, as is sometimes stipulated, power is given to the latter to serve the ordinary process of its courts in the precinct acquired.

Without the concurrent sovereignty referred to, the National Government would be nothing but an advisory government. Its executive power would be absolutely nullified.

Now, I have a few words to say about the Neagle case. The quotation which I have read from the Siebold case is cited with approval by Justice Miller in the Neagle case. My friend from Texas [Mr. LANHAM], who is a very good lawyer, does not believe in the authority of the Neagle case. I do not propose to assume here in connection with this discussion the burden of sustaining the sound constitutional validity of the decision in the Neagle case. I do not think, however, that the main criticism which was made by my friend from Texas on that case is not a very vital one against its soundness and its validity as announcing constitutional and legal principles.

The gentleman from Texas criticised that case mainly because of what? Because of the rather extraordinary fact that Neagle was removed by writ of habeas corpus by the Supreme Court of the United States from the jurisdiction of the State of California, where he had been indicted for the crime of murder, and for this reason he never had a trial by jury. Now, that is true. But if the gentleman from Texas could have examined more thoroughly the opinion in that case he would have found that this fact of removing a man from the jurisdiction of a State court by habeas corpus was by no means new or unprecedented in the history of the Republic. That was the gentleman's principal objection to the action in this case—the fact that the man did not have what, as the gentleman contends, he was entitled to have—a trial by his peers—a trial by a jury of his countrymen.

Well, in the first place the trial by jury in a State court is not one of the rights guaranteed to the State, and in the next place I say such interference with the action of a State tribunal was not without precedent. It appears that there were at least two or three precedents where the Supreme Court by the exercise of its strong arm through the writ of habeas corpus had reached out and taken men out of the jurisdiction of a State. These cases arose under the fugitive slave law, when men hunting slaves had been guilty of breaches of the peace—offenses against the peace of the State, and had been arrested and indicted and were about to be tried before the State tribunals because of such breaches of the peace. The Supreme Court of the United States in at least two or three cases reached out its strong arm by habeas corpus took the slave hunter from the jurisdiction of the State; released him—set him free—deprived the State of the right of a trial by jury.

So far as I am concerned, it does not affect the opinion in the Neagle case because the courts in those fugitive slave law cases did hold that the slave hunter was in the exercise of a power or duty pursuant to the law of the United States and were therefore subject to its jurisdiction, while they also held that Neagle was acting under the authority of the United States; that he had prevented a justice of the Supreme Court from being killed by Terry; and the court held that it was not paralyzed by reason of any condition or circumstances, but was able to reach out by habeas corpus and relieve Neagle, equally as well as a man operating under the fugitive slave law, from the operation of the local jurisdiction of the State. So far as trial by jury is concerned, the case certainly stands without any practical impeachment.

Very briefly, what was the Neagle case? And a statement of it will tend to illustrate the distinction between State and Federal jurisdiction. The Neagle case was simply this: Neagle was a deputy marshal of the United States. A decision had been rendered by a United States court and read by Mr. Justice Field, a member of the Supreme Court, against the rights contended for by Mr. Terry and his wife. Terry was in the court at the time this decision was rendered and undertook to make an assault with a bowie knife upon Justice Field.

Neagle was one of the deputy marshals that deprived him of his bowie knife and carried him from court, and Terry afterwards suffered six months' imprisonment for contempt of court. Mr.

Justice Field, having gone down to Los Angeles to hold circuit court was on his return from Los Angeles to San Francisco stopped at Fresno in the morning for breakfast.

It was apprehended that Terry would make an assault upon him, and the Attorney-General of the United States had instructed the marshal in the district of California to have a deputy marshal present to take care and charge of and to protect Mr. Justice Field while in the State of California against what were well known to be impending assaults on the part of Terry. As Field and Neagle stepped into the restaurant in Fresno, Terry and his wife left the same train and went into the restaurant and sat at another table. The justice sat at his table. Terry stepped up behind him, cuffed him once on either side of his head. Neagle rose up and said, "Stop; I am an officer," and Terry put his hand in his bosom for the purpose, undoubtedly, of drawing a bowie knife, and Neagle fired two shots and Terry fell dead. Meanwhile his wife had gone into the train to get a satchel, which turned out afterwards to contain a revolver. Under these circumstances the question was whether or not Neagle was acting under the authority of the United States or by virtue of any statute of the United States. There was no express statute authorizing the marshal to protect the judge of the circuit court or the judge of the Supreme Court, and upon this state of facts the court held, referring to the fact that what was done by Neagle would be a justification, as follows:

But such a justification would be a proper subject for consideration on a trial of the State for murder in the courts of the State of California, and there exists no authority in the courts of the United States to discharge the prisoner while held in custody by the State authorities for this offense, unless there be found in aid of the defense of the prisoner some element of power and authority asserted under the Government of the United States.

The question was, What was "some element of power and authority asserted under the Government of the United States?"

I ask the gentleman from Illinois to note this. The court laid stress upon the fact, not that Field was a justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, not that he was a judge of the circuit court of the United States and an officer of the United States and an important officer of the United States, but what?

This element is said to be found in the facts that Mr. Justice Field, when attacked, was in the immediate discharge of his duties as a judge of the circuit court of the United States within California.

And the court held on these facts, that inasmuch as the court was still in session at San Francisco and that Mr. Justice Field had gone down to Los Angeles for the purpose of holding two or three days there, and was on his return from Los Angeles to San Francisco when assaulted, he was in the discharge of his duties as a judge of a court of the United States, as he could not get from one court to the other without traveling, and therefore they held that Neagle was acting under the authority of the United States. They went further, and it is very significant, and I call the attention of the committee to this. There was another ground upon which the court based its jurisdiction to issue habeas corpus under these circumstances, and that was this—and I ask the notice of my friend from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] to this, who referred to this case.

The gentleman from Vermont called my attention to the fact that if there had been a Federal statute applying to this case in terms there would not have been any occasion for this analysis on the part of the court. That would depend on how the Federal statute read, and that was the distinction, by the way, that Mr. Justice Lamar, with whom concurred Mr. Chief Justice Fuller, held. Mr. Justice Lamar did not dissent from the reasoning of the majority at all, but he simply dissented because there was no express statute of the United States authorizing a deputy marshal to thus protect a justice of the Supreme Court, no matter what the circumstances were. There was no "law," he said. The statute in relation to habeas corpus provides that a man must be confined in pursuance of an act done under some law of the United States. There was no express law, except as may be held expressed in the matter to which I am just now going to call your attention.

Mr. Justice Lamar dissented on the ground that there was no law within the meaning of that section, no statute, which, of course, covers the suggestion of my friend from Vermont. But here is the statute of the United States which the court also relied upon in reaching its conclusion. They based it on two grounds: First, that the Attorney-General had authorized the deputy marshal to protect the justice and that he was therefore acting under the authority of the United States, and second, on this ground:

Marshals and their deputies shall have in each State the same powers in executing the laws of the United States as sheriffs and their deputies in such States may have by law in executing the laws thereof. (R. S. U. S., sec. 788; In re Neagle, 135 U. S., 68.)

It turned out that the State of California had a statute reading thus:

The sheriff must, first, preserve the peace.

And there were other sections to which I need not call attention. Now, upon this the court held as follows.

This involves the specific question, with this construction, whether or not Mr. Justice Field, under these circumstances, was in the peace of the United States or in the peace of the State alone.

And if my friend from New Jersey will bear with me for the suggestion, I handed him this book when he was making his remarks to the House, and, referring to a statute quoted at this place, he took occasion to read it. My citation was marked, but he did not read my citation. I do not know that he went so far as to see it, but it would not have helped his contention any if he had read it.

Here is what the court say:

That there is a peace of the United States; that a man assaulting a judge of the United States while in the discharge of his duties violates that peace.

That was not construing any statute. It can not be held that it was. The statute said that the sheriff must preserve the peace, and it said that the marshal had the same powers and duties that the sheriff in California had. The question was what was "the peace." Now, I submit to my friend from Indiana and my friend from Illinois that it would have been very easy for the court to have said that Mr. Justice Field was an officer of the United States; that he held the office of judge; he was essential to the discharge of the functions of the judicial branch; that he was a part of the machinery of Government, and that wherever he was he held the office and whatever he was doing he held the office, and he was, therefore, by reason of being an officer of the United States, within the peace of the United States. But they did not say that. Now, what did they say?

Mr. REEVES. Will you pardon me again?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. REEVES. If the Supreme Court had held what you have suggested, then it would have been simply a species of common-law holding. Now, I use that expression advisedly. It would have been a species of common-law holding. But the fact is, there was no statute in existence at that time to enable the court to take this man away from the State jurisdiction by virtue of the statute.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Unless this statute did it.

Mr. REEVES. Pardon me. And as there was no statute, and they did not act upon a statute, it can not be logically held, I contend that there could not have been one. It does not reach down to the bottom of it. I beg the gentleman's pardon for the interruption.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Certainly. I understand the gentleman's suggestion and I appreciate the force of it. I can not agree with him, however. In my point of view—now, I may be wrong—when the court were defining the keeping of the peace, and defining what was a breach of the peace of the United States, it was necessary to define that peace. It did not require the construction of any statute. It was simply a question of saying whether or not there was a peace of the United States and what that peace was. If there was a violation of that peace, the peace of the United States, then Neagle could be removed on habeas corpus. If there was not any peace of the United States, or if the justice was not within the peace of the United States, then Neagle could not be removed on habeas corpus. It was not the construction of a statute. It was simply defining the constitutional proposition as to whether there was or was not a peace of the United States. And here is what the court said——

Mr. RAY of New York. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Let me finish this and then I will be glad to yield. Here is what the court said. Do I make myself clear on that?

Mr. REEVES. Perfectly so.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD (reading):

That there is a peace of the United States, and that a man assaulting a judge of the United States—

Here is the qualification—

while in the discharge of his duties violates that peace; that in such case the marshal of the United States stands in the same relation to the peace of the United States which the sheriff of the county does to the peace of the State of California are questions too clear to need argument to prove them.

Now, the court did this—and I will yield to the gentleman in just a moment—the court in this case spent more than half the space occupied in their opinion in demonstrating, first, this proposition in relation to what was the peace of the United States, under what circumstances it existed, under what circumstances the United States had the Federal power to conserve it and protect a man within it, and in further demonstrating that Mr. Justice Field was in the peace of the United States. I think the gentleman will concede that if by reason of his official character all of these results could have been accomplished that work was certainly unnecessary on the part of the court. I do not say that is conclusive. I do not claim that it absolutely ends it, but it seems to me—and I am speaking with all frankness to my friend from Illinois—it seems to me that it is vastly persuasive, and certainly raises a very serious question as to whether the unlimited proposition could be sustained by the court, and is for practical purposes of legislation conclusive.

Mr. REEVES. Inasmuch as you addressed me, will you permit me for a moment?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. REEVES. Now, I agree with you, and the court did do just what you have said, and it was the only thing the court could do and take the fellow out.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That is right.

Mr. REEVES. That is the point. Now, my thought is this: That if there had been a statute they need not have resorted to this almost sophistry to get him out of there unless perchance the statute would have been unconstitutional.

Mr. RAY of New York. Now, I desire to correct the gentleman.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Well, I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. RAY of New York. The gentleman has now stated twice—I thought at first I did not hear him correctly, and I wanted to inquire of the gentleman—he has stated that there was not a statute that would enable the authorities of the United States to take control of the matter. Do I understand him correctly? To take the deputy marshal from the jurisdiction of the State of California?

Mr. REEVES. Do you want me to answer you?

Mr. RAY of New York. I want you to state whether there was a statute?

Mr. REEVES. I say there was no Federal United States statute at that time.

Mr. RAY of New York. For what?

Mr. REEVES. Now, let me finish. To justify the Federal court in taking this officer—this deputy marshal—from the State jurisdiction by a writ of habeas corpus.

Mr. RAY of New York. That is where the gentleman is wrong. I will read to my friend, or I will hand the book to my friend, giving the proceedings there, and you will find there was a statute fully justifying this, justifying them in taking him from the jurisdiction of the State of California.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I have just quoted it.

Mr. RAY of New York. The only point in the case of no statute was this: There was no statute written upon the statute book which made it the duty, in express terms, of the deputy marshal of the United States to protect a justice of the Supreme Court either in the discharge of his duty or otherwise. That is the absence of a statute that he referred to. And now, if the gentleman has the case and wants to go on with his argument, I will hand it to the gentleman from Illinois to show him.

Mr. REEVES. You need not show it to me. I have seen it perhaps as often as you have.

Mr. RAY of New York. Then you ought not to state that there is no statute giving them the right of the writ of habeas corpus.

Mr. REEVES. I do not accept the judgment of the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary upon this subject, and he need not worry himself as to whether or not I have read this decision. I know well what I have said, and I will not ask my friend to yield longer; but if the gentleman from New York had followed logically and carefully and understandingly what the gentleman from Maine has just been arguing, we would not have this misunderstanding about it.

Mr. RAY of New York. No; the question is different.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I think, perhaps, unless the gentleman insists——

Mr. RAY of New York. I do not care to interrupt you further. Go on.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Very well.

Mr. RAY of New York. I want to point out to my friend——

Mr. REEVES. Sit down right here.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. While the law school is being conducted I will go on with my remarks

Mr. LACEY. I would like to hear from the gentleman from Maine, as his time is rapidly expiring——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair asked the gentleman from Maine if he yielded to the gentlemen from Tennessee?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I stated I would yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. LACEY. These constitutional questions are very interesting, and we have a number of them——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will please suspend. The Chair has asked the gentleman from Maine if he will yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. No; I yielded to the gentleman from Iowa first, and then I will yield later to the gentleman from Tennessee.

The CHAIRMAN. But the gentleman from Tennessee had asked properly under the rule, and has the right either to be yielded to or refused.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Well, now, have I the right to yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

The CHAIRMAN. If you so desire.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I will now exercise that right, and later exercise the right of yielding to the gentleman from Tennessee.

The CHAIRMAN. That is all right.

Mr. LACEY. These formalities having been concluded——

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. The cloud having been brushed away.

Mr. LACEY. I would ask my friend to give us his views about the benefits that will be derived under the two bills that we are discussing. However interesting the discussion on the constitutional questions may be, what we want to know is how much better off Mr. McKinley would have been had there been such a change in the law made two years ago? I wish the gentleman would point out to us the difference between this particular bill of the House and the Senate, and the benefits under existing circumstances of either. The House would like to hear a discussion of that feature of the subject.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Whether it is any particular improvement?

Mr. LACEY. In other words, to explain to the committee whether it would have given President McKinley another chance for his life or given Czolgosz another chance for his life? I would be very glad for you to answer the suggestion in that respect.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. This bill, in my judgment, would beyond all question have adequately protected the President of the United States. One of the purposes or one of the reasons for the bill is the lack of uniform legislation. We have in the United States four States in which the death penalty is not imposed, and I am going to call attention to that feature now. We have seventeen other States in which life imprisonment may be substituted for it. I think I know what the gentleman from Iowa has in his mind. This law, if enacted, of course operates uniformly, and imposes the death penalty in all cases of killing the President of the United States. Now, then, if it had been enacted in these terms, would it have protected the President of the United States at Buffalo?

Mr. MORRIS. Will the gentleman permit me a question?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Perhaps after I answer this question it may answer the gentleman's question; if not, I will yield to him then. I do not think personally the President of the United States at that time was in the discharge of his official duties. It may be that I am wrong. A great many able men, a great many learned lawyers, think that the President is always in the discharge of his duties by virtue of the peculiarity of his office and the multitudinous duties devolving upon him. If it be true, then as a matter of law the President at that time was in the discharge of his official duties; and if that be true, then this bill would have fully protected him because of that feature, because it punishes the offense when he is in the performance and the actual discharge of his duties.

If, as a matter of fact, it be true, that he is always in the discharge of his duties, it would protect him, because the fact could be easily established. On the other hand, assuming my view is correct and that he is not always in the discharge of his official duties, then this bill would have protected the President of the United States in the case of the assault of Czolgosz, because there can be no question whatever that the assault made by Czolgosz was not an assault upon President McKinley as an individual, but was an assault upon the Government of the United States through McKinley as the President of the United States, by reason of the fact of his being President, and the bill expressly covers a case where the assault is committed by reason of his official character.

Now, it may be contended that in the case of the death of each of the Presidents who have had their names put upon the roll of martyrs in the service of their country—it may be contended that neither of them was in the actual discharge of duties when assassinated, but it can not be contended for a moment in the case of either that the assault was not committed by reason of the official character of the President. The great wrong we are seeking to prevent, the great injury we are seeking to remedy, the great difficulty that brings about this legislation, is what? It is a cult, it is a society, it is a theory, that does what? That instigates the murder of the Chief Magistrate of the country because they are Chief Magistrates of the country, and in every instance of that sort this bill would fully and completely protect them under that clause that prohibits an assault or a killing by reason of his official capacity. It is possible, although vastly improbable and infinitesimally improbable; it is probable that you might find a case that was not covered by one of these three provisions, "while he is engaged in the performance of his official duties, or because of his official character, or because of any of his official acts or omissions."

Mr. LACEY. Will the gentleman permit me a question?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has thirty-five minutes.

Mr. LACEY. I will not take up much of the gentleman's time.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LACEY. Under the provisions of this bill, instead of having a plain, simple case, as the assassin of President McKinley was called upon to meet, you would have had his attorney placed in the position of first meeting the question of whether he killed McKinley because he was President, and, second, whether the President was in the discharge of his official duty. It seems to me we would be furnishing acute lawyers with two additional defenses to use in this case instead of helping in the protection of the President. Does not the gentleman think there is danger in this form of the bill by weakening the protection?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. It does not seem to me so. Even if there was danger it does not go to the jurisdictional features of the bill, as the gentleman will concede. It seems to me to be reasonable, that where the President of the United States is killed, there is no difficulty in establishing the offense, the corpus delicti, the identity of the assailant. I do not believe, as a practical proposition, that these necessary elements of jurisdiction, although they do involve questions of fact—I do not believe that these elements of jurisdiction involve questions of fact that would disturb a jury one-sixteenth part of a minute in reaching a conclusion that the man was guilty.

Mr. PALMER. Suppose this bill had been the law at the time President McKinley was killed, and suppose the gentleman from Maine had been called on to draw an indictment under it for that offense, would he not have been obliged to aver that Czolgosz killed Mr. McKinley knowing that he was the President of the United States?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. No, not necessarily; the element of being in the discharge of his duties might not be thus qualified.

Mr. PALMER. Then I do not read your bill aright. Under the bill the offense must be done "willfully, purposely, and knowingly."

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes; those are the qualifying words.

Mr. PALMER. How could you have proved, or how could the State of New York have proved in that case, that Czolgosz knew that he was killing the President of the United States?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] does not think it would be necessary to have direct evidence of that fact?

Mr. PALMER. Yes; if the fact was averred in the indictment.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Direct evidence?

Mr. PALMER. Certainly.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Would not circumstancial evidence have been sufficient?

Mr. PALMER. What circumstances?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I can not stop to detail all the circumstances that existed; but from the facts and circumstances in connection with the assault the inference was absolutely irresistible that Czolgosz knew that Mr. McKinley was the President of the United States and killed him for that reason. He had never seen Mr. McKinley; he did not know him. Mr. McKinley was standing there holding a reception, and Czolgosz, approaching with a revolver concealed under a handkerchief, fired a shot at the President of the United States. What reason did he have for making the assault? That is a question that would have to be argued before the jury. What occasion could he have had for the assault? And if it could be made to appear that there could have been no other motive than that Mr. McKinley was the President of the United States, by the familiar process of exclusion, my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER], if he had held in that case the position which he so honorably held in the State of Pennsylvania, could have secured a verdict at the hands of the jury, because no other reason could have been assigned for the assault than that Mr. McKinley was President of the United States. That is my suggestion in answer to the gentleman's question.

Mr. PALMER. The gentleman concedes, of course, that anything averred in the indictment must be proved beyond reasonable doubt. Now, would not the gentleman have been obliged to aver, in an indictment drawn under this bill, that the President was in the exercise of his official duty?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes.

Mr. PALMER. Now, is it a fact that the President, while opening the fair at Buffalo, was in the exercise of his official duty?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. No; I do not think that he was, although that might perhaps be held to be an official function, as he was there in his official character.

Mr. PALMER. But if that were averred in the indictment, must it not be proved?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. No; there is an alternative proposition. Either he must have been in the performance of his official duty or the killing must have been by reason of his official character. Either would have been sufficient.

A MEMBER. How could you aver an alternative?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. You could make three separate counts. I have been prosecuting attorney, and I have often drawn indictments. I presume the gentleman knows I am correct.

A MEMBER. Certainly you are right.

Mr. SNODGRASS. I desire to suggest to the gentleman that, in addition to discussing these other questions, he devote some of his attention to section 9 of the bill, where it undertakes to provide for offenses against the representatives of foreign nations.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I think on that point I shall have to ask the gentleman to excuse me because of want of time. I fear because of interruptions (for which I always desire to yield as amiably as possible) I shall only have time to make a brief statement. The gentleman wishes me to show what power we have to make special provision for the punishment of those who kill ambassadors in this country. Well, Mr. Chairman, ambassadors represent, of course, in their persons their home governments. Their governments are present in their persons. In the case of United States v. Arjona (120 U. S. Reps., p. 479) the court held that a statute prohibiting the counterfeiting of bonds, notes, and securities of a foreign government was valid by reason of international comity and by reason of the power that we are entitled to exercise under international law. The committee thought that if we could punish the counterfeiting of bonds, notes, and securities of a foreign country, it would be very surprising if we could not punish an assault upon a foreign government itself when it is here in the person of its ambassadors.

These extracts show what reasons the court gave for their conclusion:

> The law of nations requires every nation to use "due diligence" to prevent a wrong being done within its own dominion to another nation with which it is at peace, or to the people thereof; and because of this the obligation of one nation to punish those who within its own jurisdiction counterfeit the money of another nation has long been recognized. (P. 484.)
> A right secured by the law of nations to a nation or its people is one the United States as a representative of this nation is bound to protect. Consequently a law which is necessary and proper to afford this protection is one that Congress may enact, because it is one that is needed to carry into execution a power conferred by the Constitution on the Government of the United States exclusively. There is no authority in the United States to require the passage and enforcement of such a law by the States.
> Therefore the United States must have the power to pass it and enforce it themselves or be unable to perform a duty which they may owe to another nation and which the law of nations has imposed on them as part of their international obligations.
> This, however, does not prevent a State from providing for the punisment of the same thing, for here, as in the case of counterfeiting the coin of the United States, the act may be an offense against the authority of a State as well as that of the United States. (P. 487.)

To resume for a moment on the main question. It is said that the President is a part of the machinery of the Government, and that you can not destroy the machinery in whole or in part without crippling the Government to that extent, and that therefore killing an officer is an attack upon the Government.

If, upon that theory, it be assumed, as we do not think it properly can be, that every killing of an officer irrespective of the discharge of his duties is an interference with or an impeding the Government and an attack upon the Government, it necessarily follows that it is so by reason of the official character of the person killed, as otherwise the killing of the particular person would have no connection with the Government. Then, as a man is presumed to intend the probable consequences of his act, he would in that case be presumed to have intended to attack the Government, and as he could attack the Government only by reason of the official capacity of the person killed, he would be presumed to have killed him by reason of his official capacity, a condition expressly provided for by this bill.

COURT CAN NOT CONSTRUE EXCEPTIONS INTO THE STATUTE.

While it seems to be conceded that if the Senate bill is too broad in its definition of jurisdiction it would be held unconstitutional, a brief reference to the law on that question should be made. It could not be sustained upon the ground that although going beyond the House bill, it includes the jurisdiction described in the House upon the theory that the greater includes the less. This would require the court to read into the act the limitations and restrictions which it has uniformly held it will not do, as the cases clearly show.

Upon this question United States v. Reese (92 U. S., 214) is in point. In that case the court had under consideration the constitutionality of the third and fourth sections of the act of May 31, 1870, chapter 114, now constituting sections 2007, 2008, and 5506 of the Revised Statutes. The third section of the act made it an offense for any judge, inspector, or other officer of election, whose duty it was, under the circumstances therein stated, to receive and count the vote of any citizen, to wrongfully refuse to receive and count the same; and the fourth section made it an offense for any person, by force, bribery, or other unlawful means, to hinder or delay any citizen from voting at any election or from doing any act required to be done to qualify him to vote.

The ground of the decision was that the sections referred to were broad enough not only to punish those who hindered and delayed the enfranchised colored citizen from voting, on account of his race, color, or previous condition of servitude, but also those who hindered or delayed the free white citizen. The court, speaking by the Chief Justice, said:

It would certainly be dangerous if the legislature could set a net large enough to catch all possible offenders and leave it to the courts to step inside and say who could be rightfully detained and who should be set at large. This would, to some extent, substitute the judicial for the legislative department of the Government. The courts enforce the legislative will, when ascertained, if within the constitutional grant of power. But if Congress steps outside of its constitutional limitation and attempts that which is beyond its reach, the courts are authorized to, and when called upon must, annul its encroachment upon the revered rights of the States and the people.

An attempt was made there as here to limit the statute by construction, so as to make it operate only on that which Congress might rightfully prohibit and punish; but to this the court said (p. 221);

For this purpose we must take these sections as they are. We are not able to reject a part which is unconstitutional and retain the remainder, because it is not possible to separate that which is unconstitutional, if there be any such, from that which is not. The proposed effect is not to be attained by striking out or disregarding words that are in the section, but by inserting those that are not now there. Each of the sections must stand as a whole or fall all together. The language is plain. There is no room for construction, unless it be as to the effect of the Constitution. The question then to be determined is whether we can introduce words of limitation into a penal statute so as to make it specific, when, as expressed, it is general only.

This was answered in the negative, the court remarking:

To limit this statute in the manner now asked for would be to make a new law, not to enforce an old one.

This precise point was again passed on and emphasized in Baldwin v. Franks (120 U. S., pp. 685–686).

The court there said:

In United States v. Harris (106 U. S., 629) it was decided that this section was unconstitutional, as a provision for the punishment of conspiracies of the character therein mentioned, within a State. It is now said, however, that in that case the conspiracy charged was by persons in a State against a citizen of the United States and of the State to deprive him of the protection he was entitled to under the laws of that State, no special rights or privileges arising under the Constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States being involved; and it is argued that, although the section be invalid so far as such an offense is concerned, it is good for the punishment of those who conspire to deprive aliens of the rights guaranteed to them in a State by the treaties of the United States.

In support of this argument reliance is had on the well-settled rule that a statute may be in part constitutional and in part unconstitutional, and that under some circumstances the part which is constitutional will be enforced and only that which is unconstitutional rejected. To give effect to this rule, however, the parts—that which is constitutional and that which is unconstitutional—must be capable of separation, so that each may be read by itself.

This statute, considered as a statute punishing conspiracies in a State, is not of that character, for in that connection it has no parts within the meaning of the rule. Whether it is separable, so that it can be enforced in a Territory, though not in a State, is quite another question and one we are not now called on to decide. It provides in general terms for the punishment of all who conspire for the purpose of depriving any person or any class of persons of the equal protection of the laws or of equal privileges or immunities under the laws. A single provision, which makes up the whole section, embraces those who conspire against citizens as well as those who conspire against aliens, those who conspire to deprive one of his rights under the laws of a State and those who conspire to deprive him of his rights under the Constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States. The limitation which is sought must be made, if at all, by construction, not by separation. This, it has often been decided, is not enough.

THE JURISDICTIONS ARE CONCURRENT.

That the same act will, under this statute, constitute an offense under the law of the State as well as the United States is no objection to this legislation, and the idea is not novel.

The people of the United States resident within any State are subject to two governments, one State and the other national, but there need be no conflict between the two. The powers which one possesses the other does not. They are established for different purposes and have separate jurisdictions. Together they make one whole and furnish the people of the United States with a complete government, ample for the protection of all their rights at home and abroad.

True, it may sometimes happen that a person is amenable to both jurisdictions for one and the same act. Thus, if a marshal of the United States is unlawfully resisted while executing the process of the courts within a State, and the resistance is accompanied by an assault on the officer, the sovereignty of the United States is violated by the resistance and that of the State by the breach of the peace in the assault. So, too, if one passes counterfeit coin of the United States within a State, it may be an offense against the United States and the State; the United States because it discredits the coin, and the State because of the fraud upon him to whom it is passed. This does not, however, necessarily imply that the two governments possess powers in common, or bring them into conflict with each other. It is the natural consequence of a citizenship which owes allegiance to two sovereignties and claims protection from both. The citizen can not complain, because he has voluntarily submitted himself to such a form of government. He owes allegiance to the two departments, so to speak, and within their respective spheres must pay the penalties which each exacts for disobedience to its laws. In return, he can demand protection from each within its own jurisdiction. (United States v. Cruikshank, 92 U. S., 550.)

CONVICTION OR ACQUITTAL IN ONE NO BAR IN THE OTHER JURISDICTION.

That there is no conflict in these jurisdictions, and that a trial resulting in either a conviction or an acquittal in either tribunal has no legal effect upon a subsequent trial in the other jurisdiction is well settled by authority as well as reason. While the act may be the same, the offense in one case is against the State sovereignty and in the other against Federal sovereignty.

ONE ACT CONSTITUTING DISTINCT CRIMES AGAINST DIFFERENT SOVEREIGNTIES.

(7) When an act is a violation of the criminal law of two different governments, jeopardy or punishment under the law of one government will not bar a prosecution and punishment under the law of the other. In such case the one act creates two separate and distinct crimes. It follows that in the United States, if the same act is a transgression of the laws of two States, or of a State and the United States, a trial in one jurisdiction for a violation of its law will not prevent a prosecution in the other jurisdiction for the act regarded as a violation of the law of the latter.

(8) ONE ACT VIOLATING BOTH A STATE LAW AND A MUNICIPAL ORDINANCE.

So it is the almost universally accepted doctrine that where an act violates both a municipal ordinance and a State law a prosecution under one will not bar a prosecution under the other.

(9) ONE ACT VIOLATING BOTH A MILITARY AND A GENERAL LAW.

An act criminal both by military and general law is subject to be tried either by a military or civil court, and a conviction or acquittal in the one court can not be pleaded as a bar to a prosecution in the other. (American and English Encyclopædia of Law, 2d ed., vol. 17, p. 604, pp. 7, 8, 9).

EXTRATERRITORIAL CRIME.

I come to the second question to which I wish to call attention, and this is this proposition. The Senate bill contains in its last clause of section 1, an effort to punish a foreigner for committing an offense in a foreign country upon a foreigner, entirely outside of the jurisdiction of the United States. I know that the bill may be susceptible of a different construction, but I understand it to be the purpose of those who drew the clause to confer upon the Government of the United States the power to punish in this country a man who assassinates in England the King of England. Now, I submit that is an attempt to exercise an entirely unconstitutional power. It is attempted to be justified in the Senate by the statement that an offense of that sort is an offense against the law of nations, and I am briefly going to call attention to that.

Mr. REEVES. Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask unanimous consent, before we go any further, that the gentleman may be permitted to conclude his remarks, and I do it now for this reason, that he has been interrupted and is now so hurried that he can not state his position as he wants to, and after consultation with him I make this request.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. TOMPKINS of Ohio). The Chair will state to the gentleman from Illinois that the Chair regrets that the suggestion can not be complied with for the reason that the House has fixed the time when this debate shall end. I will state to the gentleman from Maine that he has twenty minutes remaining.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from New Jersey?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. PARKER. I want to ask whether that section of the Senate bill to which the gentleman referred does not refer to crimes committed here, as, for instance, if Edward VII should come to this country, or William of Germany, and he should be killed here by somebody who maliciously caused his death, or if they sent poison by mail from here which caused the death of either one of these sovereigns; is not that the meaning of the section?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I will say in answer to my friend from New Jersey that the bill is susceptible in one sense of the construction that the gentleman from New Jersey places upon it, and if the bill read as follows: "That any person who shall, within the limits of the United States or any place subject to the jurisdiction thereof, willfully or maliciously kill or cause the death of the President or Vice-President or any officer thereof upon whom the powers and duties of the President may devolve, or any sovereign or chief magistrate of any foreign country," the inference would be practically conclusive; but it does not so read.

Mr. PARKER. It ought to read so.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes, it ought to read so; and the reason why it does not so read, I am authoritatively advised, is because the Senate actually intends by this section to punish a crime committed entirely outside of the jurisdiction of the United States, because by reason of a mistaken conception of the law they say the offense is an offense against the law of nations. I shall have to hurry upon this because I can not elaborate as I would like to in the time that I have, and I hope that I will not be interrupted.

Mr. PARKER. I do not think the gentleman need elaborate on that. I think everybody in the House agrees with him.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Every member of the House may not be of the opinion of my friend from New Jersey, because all of the members of the Senate committee and the lawyers in the Senate were of the other opinion, and those same lawyers that sent down here this indefinite description and unlimited jurisdiction under this jurisdictional section in this bill—sent down as a constitutional proposition the proposition that you can punish a foreigner for an offense committed in a foreign country upon a foreigner entirely outside of this jurisdiction. The same Senate and the same committee send us the same propositions. I do not think that everybody concedes, as does my friend from New Jersey, that this last clause is clearly unconstitutional. I do not say that it destroys all the weight to be given to the opinion of the Senate on the clause of the Senate bill which I have been discussing, but it tends strongly in that direction. The provisions of the Constitution under which this last clause is sought to be justified are these:

To define and punish piracies and felonies committed on the high seas and offenses against the law of nations. (Constitution, Art. I, sec. 8, p. 10.)

These are two other provisions of the Constitution which should be quoted in this connection:

The trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury; and such trial shall be held in the State where the said crimes shall have been committed, but when not committed within any State, the trial shall be at such place or places as the Congress may by law have directed. (Constitution, Art. III, sec. 2, p. 3.)

In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defense. (Constitutional amendment, Art. VI.)

Clearly this is not an offense on the high seas. It is said to be an offense against the law of nations. Now, what is the law of nations? The law of nations is simply international law. And what is international law? It is the law between—inter, between. Between what and whom? Between separate and independent sovereignties; the law that governs and controls and regulates the rights of independent sovereignties as between each other. How, then, can an offense against a municipal law and one sovereignty be in any sense an offense against the law that regulates the rights of independent sovereignties as between each other? It does not interfere with the relations of each other. It has no connection whatever with international law or with the law of nations. The law of nations is defined by the various writers on international law, as follows:

LAW OF NATIONS.

By this law we are to understand that code of public instruction which defines the rights and prescribes the duties of nations in their intercourse with each other. (Kent Com., Vol. I, p. 1.)

That collection of rules—customary, conventional, and judical—which independent states appeal to for the purpose of determining their rights, prescribing their duties, and regulating their intercourse in peace and war, imposed by opinion and based upon the consent of nations. (Kent on International Law, p. 6.)

International law has been defined as the rule which determines the conduct of the general body of civilized states in their dealings with one another. (Amer. and Eng. Enc. Law, vol. 16, p. 1124.)

International law is the system of rules which regulates the intercourse and determines the rights and obligations of sovereign States. (Minor's Institutes, Vol. I, p. 22.)

International law, as understood among civilized nations, may be defined as consisting of those rules of conduct which reason deduces as consonant to justice from the nature of the society existing among independent nations with such definitions and modifications as may be established by general consent. (Wheaton's Int. Law (Boyd), p. 21.)

International law may be defined as the rules which determine the conduct of the general body of civilized States in their dealings with one another. (Lawrence, Principles Int. Law, p. 1.)

International law is the body of rules prevailing between the States. It may also be described as the body of rules governing the relations of a State to all outsiders, whether other States or private persons not its own subjects. (Westlake, International Law, p. 1.)

Thence arises a third kind of law to regulate this mutual intercourse called the "law of nations," which, as none of these States will acknowledge a superiority in the other, can not be dictated by any, but depends entirely upon the rules of natural law or upon mutual compacts, treaties, leagues, and agreements between these several communities, in the construction also of which compacts we have no other rule to resort to but the law of nature, being the only one to which all the communities are equally subject, and therefore the civil law very justly observes "that rule which natural reason has dictated to all men is called the law of nations." (Blackstone, Vol. I, page 44, Cooley.)

In a more limited sense, which is that usually understood, the term "law of nations" expresses those rules which govern the conduct of States in their relation with each other. (Manning Laws of Nations, p. 2.)

International law is the system of moral principles and positive rules by which the conduct of States, one toward another, is or ought to be determined. (Creasey First Platform Int. Law, p. 1.)

The law of nations is a complex system composed of various ingredients. It consists of general principles of right and justice equally suitable to the government of individuals in a state of natural equality and the relations and conduct of nations, of a collection of usages, customs, and opinions, the growth of civilization and commerce, and of a code of positive law. (Maine Int. Law, p. 33.)

The law of nations (which I may venture to define as the public opinion of the government of the civilized world with reference to the rights which any State would be justified in vindicating for itself by a resort to arms) is no doubt incorporated into the common law which binds the courts of the country. (Holland Studies in International Law, p. 194.)

The ablest of writers to whom I allude admits that the great purpose of international law is to maintain right against national wrongdoers. (Creasey First Platform of Int. Law, sec. 76.)

By the law of nations we mean such rules as nations or civil societies are obliged to observe in their intercourse with one another. (Rutherford's Institute, p. 13.)

Offenses against the law of nations are defined as follows:

The violation of a treaty of peace.
Violation of passports.
Violation of ambassadors. (Kent's Com., Vol. I, p. 182.)

PIRACY.

Pirates have been regarded by all civilized nations as the enemies of the human race and the most atrocious violators of universal law of society. (Ibid, 184.)

SLAVE TRADE.

Whether it (slave trade) is to be considered as an offense against the law of nations, independent of compact, has been a grave question much litigated in the courts charged with the administration of public law. (Kent, Vol. I, pp. 182 to 192.)

Criminal laws can not operate extraterritorially.

I want to call attention now briefly to what the authorities say, in order that the RECORD may show precisely what has been held in connection with the punishment of extraterritorial crime.

Bishop on Criminal Law says:

But to punish a foreign murderer simply because his victim came among us to die is to usurp the functions of the foreign government. We often see foreign governments omitting what we deem to be their duty, but to jump uninvited into every vacuum of this sort would be to make ourselves a nuisance in the family of nations. (Vol. I, sec. 116.)

In the words of a learned New Jersey judge, "an act to be criminal must be alleged to be an offense against the sovereign of the government." This is the very essense of crime punishable by human law. How can an act done in one jurisdiction be an offense against the sovereignty of another. (Ibid., sec. 112.)

But by a very ancient principle of English common law adopted in this country all crimes are strictly local and the offenders are justiciable only in the countries where the criminal act is done. Therefore English and American law would generally refuse to try and punish a British or American citizen on his return home for a criminal offense perpetrated by him in a foreign territory. (International Law, Pomeroy, p. 205.)

That is Pomeroy's International Law; but some nations extend the operation of their laws so as to reach offenses committed upon their subjects on foreign territory.

In this procedure municipal law only is concerned, and not international law; and as might be supposed, laws differ greatly in their provisions. (Woolsey, International Law, p. 78.)

By the common law of England, which has been adopted in this respect in the United States, criminal offenses are considered as altogether local and justiciable only by the courts of that country where the offense is committed. (Wheaton, International Law (Boyd), p. 154.)

But some nations extend the operation of their laws so as to reach crimes committed by their subjects upon foreign territory. In this procedure municipal law only is concerned and not international, and as might be supposed laws greatly differ in their provisions. (Woolsey, International Law, p. 78.)

Owing to differences in their constitutional systems a more limited control is asserted by Great Britain and the United States, whose criminal jurisprudence rests upon the general principle common to both that crimes are territorial and justiciable only in the courts of the country where committed. (International Public Law, Taylor, sec. 195.)

It is evident that a state can not punish an offense against its municipal laws committed within the territory of another state unless by its own citizens. (Wheaton, International Law (Boyd), p. 154.)

Without special agreement among the states none can arrest or punish subjects of the others for offenses committed outside its own jurisdiction, even though they are regarded as offenses by the law of the state to which the offender belongs. This is so clear that no attempt has been made to assume a kind of international jurisdiction over acts declared to be piracy by municipal laws, except in the one case of the slave trade. (Lawrence, Principles of International Law, sec. 123.)

A state has authority over foreigners within its territory, not over foreigners abroad. An attempt to punish an alien within the territory for an offense committed before he came to it is an attempt to exercise jurisdiction over acts done in another state, and is thus contrary to the very principle of territorial jurisdiction on which it is based. In similar cases a state can punish its own citizens, but its right to do so is based upon the personal claim it has to their allegiance wherever they may be.

There is no personal tie in the case of aliens; and it may justly be contended that any attempt to exercise over them such jurisdiction as we are considering would give grounds for remonstrance from the state of which they were subjects. (Lawrence, Principles of International Law, p. 220.)

But although a state takes no cognizance of offenses beyond its limits and against the laws of another country, it nevertheless can punish the crimes of its own citizens under its own laws, if within their reach, no matter where the crime may have been committed. (Baker, International Law, p. 77.)

So much for the elementary writers.

Discussing whether the slave trade was against the law of nations, the court in The Antelope (10 Wheat., 121) lays down rules which clearly exclude murder in a foreign country as an offense against the law of nations.

This which was the usage of all could not be pronounced repugnant to the law of nations, which is certainly to be tried by the tests of general usage. That which has received the assent of all must be the law of all.

Whatever might be the answer of a moralist to this question, a jurist must search for its legal solution in those principles of action which are sanctioned by the usages, the national acts, and the general assent of that portion of the world of which he considers himself as a part, and to whose law this appeal is made. If we resort to this standard as the test of international law, the question, as has already been observed, is decidedly in favor of the legality of the trade.

The courts of no country execute the penal laws of another. (Ibid, 123.)

It is conceded that the legislation of every country is territorial; that beyond its own territory it can only affect its own subjects and citizens. It is not easy to conceive a power to execute a municipal law or to enforce obedience to that law without the circle in which that law operates.

Said Mr. Chief Justice Marshall in Rose & Himley, 4 Cranch, 218.

Directly in point is the discussion of the court in United States v. Pirates (5 Wheaton, 192), where they were considering whether a statute could be extended to a murder committed on the high seas, a place over which, in a sense, we have at least concurrent jurisdiction, and to that extent the law might not be extraterritorial. The court said:

The question whether murder committed at sea, on board a foreign vessel, be punishable by the laws of the United States, if committed by a foreigner upon a foreigner, is one which involves a variety of considerations.

The reasonable presumption is that the legislature intended to legislate only on cases within the scope of that power.

Page 195:

Robbery on the sea is considered as an offense within the criminal jurisdiction of all nations. It is against all and punished by all; and there can be no doubt that the plea of autrefois acquit would be good in any civilized state, though resting under prosecution instituted in the courts of any other civilized state.

Not so with the crime of murder. It is an offense too abhorrent to the feelings of man to have made it necessary that it also should have been brought within this universal jurisdiction. And hence punishing it, when committed within the jurisdiction or (what is the same thing) in the vessel of another nation, has not been acknowledged as a right, much less an obligation. It is punishable under the laws of each state, and I am inclined to think that an acquittal in this case would not have been a good plea in a court of Great Britain. Testing my construction of this section, therefore, by the rule that I have assumed, I am led to the conclusion that it does not extend the punishment for murder to the case of that offense committed by a foreigner upon a foreigner in a foreign ship.

Page 197: If by calling murder piracy it might assert a jurisdiction over that offense committed by a foreigner in a foreign vessel, what offense might not be brought within their power by the same device? The most offensive interference with the governments of other nations might be defended by the precedent.

Upon the whole, I am satisfied that Congress never intended to punish murder in cases with which they had no right to interfere nor leave unpunished the crime of piracy in any cases in which they might punish it.

There is no elementary writer, there is no judge, there is no decision holding that any statute can be passed in any country that affects a foreigner committing an offense in a foreign country upon a foreigner.

There are authorities that hold that the jurisdiction of a State may follow its subjects into a foreign country and punish its subjects for acts committed there. There are cases that hold that an offense committed in a foreign country against the sovereign of the country that is undertaking to punish him may be taken cognizance of; but there is no case, there is no elementary writer, there is no judge of any court holding that an offense committed by a foreigner in a foreign country upon a foreigner is justiciable anywhere except in the foreign country where committed; but this is what the Senate bill undertakes to do.

Mr. Chief Justice Marshall while a member of Congress made a celebrated speech in which, having occasion to discuss this question, he used the following language:

Suppose a duel attended with death in the fleet of a foreign nation or in any vessel which returned safe to port. Could it be pretended that any government on earth other than that to which the fleet or vessel belonged had jurisdiction in the case, or that the offender could be tried by the laws or tribunals of any other nation whatever? Suppose a private theft by one mariner from another, and the vessel to perform its voyage and return in safety, would it be contended that all nations have equal cognizance of the crime and are equally authorized to punish it?

* * * * * * *

But an offense which in its nature affects only a particular nation is only punishable by that nation.

* * * * * * *

But piracy, under the law of nations, which alone is punishable by all nations, can only consist in an act which is an offense against all. No particular nation can increase or diminish the list of offenses thus punishable.

* * * * * * *

It has already been shown that the legislative jurisdiction of a nation extends only to its own territory and to its own citizens, wherever they may be. Any general expression in a legislative act must necessarily be restrained to objects within the jurisdiction of the legislation passing the act.

* * * * * * *

To have tried him for the murder would have been mere mockery. To have condemned and executed him, its court having no jurisdiction, would have been murder.

If John Marshall was correct, the Senate bill if enforced would result in judicial murder.

The gentleman asks me what I think of a section in our bill that prohibits conspiracies here against foreign magistrates abroad. That contemplates an offense committed within our jurisdiction against magistrates elsewhere; but the Senate bill goes vastly beyond that. Now, not only is this the law of the land, but it is in accord with the universal unbroken practice of the Republic.

The Cutting case is the most extreme illustration of the application of these principles that we have in our history. The Cutting case was simply this: A man by the name of Cutting, in 1886, living in El Paso, Mexico, published in Mexico a libel upon a citizen of Mexico. He was arrested in Mexico, and he entered into a conciliation, a scheme they have there for the purpose of avoiding punishment in case of a prosecution of that sort. The very next day he went across the line of Mexico into El Paso, Tex., and there published the same libel in Texas upon the same citizen of Mexico.

Mexico had a statute providing that an offense committed against a citizen of Mexico, even though in a foreign country, could be justiciable in Mexico. Upon that proposition the United States declared its position, and I call the attention of the distinguished body that sits elsewhere to its indignant declarations. The President of the United States, Grover Cleveland, called attention to it in his message. He acted, I have no doubt, under the advice of his Attorney-General. I do not remember whether it was Attorney-General Harmon or Attorney-General Olney. He said:

The admission of such a pretension would be attended with serious results, invasion of the jurisdiction of this Government, and highly dangerous to our citizens in foreign lands; therefore I have denied it and protested against its attempted exercise as unwarranted by the principles of law and international usage. * * * Whatever the degree to which extraterritorial criminal jurisdiction may have been formerly allowed by consent and reciprocal agreement among certain of the European States, no such doctrine or practice was ever known to the laws of this country or of that from which our institutions have been mainly derived.

Secretary Bayard, in the same case, wrote:

The proposition that Mexico can take jurisdiction of its author on account of its publication in Texas is wholly inadmissible, and is peremptorily denied by this Government.

He further said:

In the absence of any treaty of amity between the United States and Mexico providing for trial of the citizens of the two countries, respectively, the rules of international law would forbid the assumption of such power by Mexico as is contained in the Penal Code at 186, above cited. The existence of such power was and is denied by the United States.

Mr. J. B. Moore, an able writer on international law, who made an exhaustive statement of the Government's case, says this:

I shall now show that such claim has been pronounced by the highest judicial tribunal in France to be unwarranted by the principles of international law.

The legislation of France was relied on as a precedent for the law under which a citizen of the United States could be punished for an offense committed in the United States against a citizen of Mexico. The French court of last resort has held that—

The French tribunals are without power to judge foreigners for acts committed by them in a foreign country; that their incompetence in this regard is absolute and permanent; that it can be waived neither by the silence or consent of the accused.

This is what Chief Justice Story said in the case of Apollen, 9 Wheat., 362.

The laws of no nation can justly extend beyond its own territories except so far as regards its own citizens. They can have no force to control the sovereignty of any other nation within its own jurisdiction, and however general and comprehensive the phrase used in our municipal laws may be, they must always be restricted in construction to places and persons upon whom the legislature have authority and jurisdiction.

Now, there is the practice in the United States, there is the law of the land, and in the teeth of it the Senate has sent down to us a bill containing this provision, and the Judiciary Committee——

Mr. WARNOCK. Section 3 is the only section in the Senate bill that provides against an offense in a foreign nation.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. If the gentleman will excuse me. Section 1 is somewhat ambiguous. I do not say that it of necessity applies only to an offense committed in a foreign country, but I am advised it is intended to.

Mr. WARNOCK. But the language reads——

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I know how the language reads.

Mr. WARNOCK. "That any person who shall, within the limits of the United States or any place subject to the jurisdiction thereof."

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. It does not read that way.

Mr. WARNOCK. But that is the first part. That is the part that comes in another section.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Well, did the gentleman hear me when I began the discussion?

Mr. WARNOCK. Yes; and I have all along been wanting to call your attention to it.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That statute is for the purpose of defining the offenses, they are stated in two alternatives. The description in the first alternative is "to kill or cause the death of the President of the United States." Then the next offense in the alternative is "or the Vice-President of the United States or any officer thereof upon whom the powers and duties of the President may devolve." These relate back to the place described, if it read this way, "or the sovereign or chief magistrate," the inference would he irresistible; but it does not so read in the Senate bill. In the first instance they used the word "kill," and the definition is "willfully and maliciously kill or cause the death." As to the sovereign, they changed the description of the offense, and say "willfully and maliciously cause the death." Now, I am advised—I want to be frank with the gentleman; I do not say that it is a necessary construction; I do not say that the language can compel that result and no other—but I am advised on an authority on which I absolutely rely that that clause is intended to accomplish that result.

Mr. WARNOCK. It can not exceed what it says.

Mr. OLMSTED. But penal statutes are to be strictly construed.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. The Senate intended to accomplish this result to which I have called attention. I agree with my friend from Pennsylvania; I do not think the language is conclusive. I agree with you that the criminal law is to be construed strictly, and that the language might not accomplish what was intended to be accomplished by it; but inasmuch as we know that it is in the clause, we feel it to be our duty to call the attention of the House to the real intent of the act. I hope I may make the point plain. I have no disagreement with my friends. These are the only suggestions I have to make in reference to the constitutionality of this measure. Now, just a few moments and I will pass to another question. Did the gentleman from Minnesota have a question he wanted to ask me?

Mr. MORRIS. The gentleman has already answered almost the entire question which I expected to ask. But this one further suggestion: In section 1 the Judiciary Committee, by this bill, provides that "any person who unlawfully, purposely, and knowingly kills the President of the United States while he is engaged in the performance of his official duties, or because of his official character, or because of any of his official acts or omissions, shall suffer death." As I understood the gentleman from Maine, in his view President McKinley at Buffalo was not in the performance of his official duty.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I would not state that as an absolute proposition, because I would not go so far as that.

Mr. MORRIS. The gentleman thinks there is a question about it?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Well, let us assume that he was not. Now, come to the next proposition, "or because of his official character." As I understood the gentleman, he said that surely Czolgosz had killed McKinley because of his official character. Now, what was the proof that Czolgosz had killed McKinley because of his official character?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. In that case the proof was absolutely overwhelming. There was in the development of what followed declaration after declaration by Czolgosz himself. Now, then, if the gentleman will excuse me, of course the gentleman from Minnesota does not think that it would be incumbent on the Government to prove direct declarations by the assassin that he intended to kill him by reason of his official character. The gentleman will concede that if the circumstances of the case were such as to lead the jury to that conclusion, that would be sufficient.

Mr. MORRIS. But the gentleman from Maine will also concede that Czolgosz was a very obscure man and that very few people had ever heard of him before.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Now, suppose he had made no declaration; suppose he had gone to the President and shot him dead.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. And had said nothing about it, had been arrested and brought up for trial, would the gentleman say it would be incumbent on the Government to prove that he killed the President because of his official character?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Undoubtedly.

Mr. MORRIS. How would the Government prove it?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I do not think the Government would have the slightest earthly difficulty. Now, we do not want to get too much disturbed about the technical part of this matter. Does the gentleman from Minnesota think that he would succeed if he were standing in court defending Czolgosz under these circumstances when he could not show any other motive on the part of Czolgosz?

Mr. MORRIS. The mere killing of the President would not furnish the presumption.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. No; all the circumstances would be taken into account. All the circumstances taken into consideration would disclose that there was no other reason or purpose for the killing.

Mr. MORRIS. The position of the gentleman from Maine is that there would have been a presumption that he killed him because of his official character.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. There is no presumption about it. Can not the gentleman from Minnesota distinguish between a presumption and a conclusion drawn from the circumstances of the case? Circumstantial evidence is relied upon in all trials, in all courts, in all countries. It does not involve any presumption, Mr. MORRIS. But the only circumstances would have been the killing of the President.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. No, not by any means. Some of the circumstances would be that McKinley was present there as President of the United States. He was being introduced to the people as President of the United States. He was standing there as President of the United States, and Czolgosz was introduced to him, as were the other people, as President of the United States. It would have been shown that he had no acquaintance with him; that he had no occasion to assault him—no occasion for any grudge against him. When a man kills a President at a public reception of this kind, what is the inference? Under all these circumstances, how long would it take a jury of twelve intelligent men to arrive at the conclusion that it was by reason of his official character that he was killed? [Loud applause.]

I have discussed the principal legal objections to the Senate bill. I have just a word as to the seventh section, providing for a bodyguard for the President. Its only prototype in history, so far as I know, is the Pretorian guard of infamous memory. Under this section the Secretary of War could detail the whole Army for that purpose. Although the President is under the Constitution the Commander in Chief of the Army, this bill proposes to authorize the Secretary of War to make such regulations as he may see fit prescribing their duties. He can thus make them subject to his orders instead of the President's, and, inasmuch as he is further authorized to keep them a profound secret, the Secretary of War is thus enabled to become a military dictator if he chooses. This savors of imperialism run mad.

SENATE BILL WITH HOUSE AMENDMENTS.

The parts printed in brackets [ ] show the bill as passed Senate.

An act (S. 3653) for the protection of the President of the United States, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, [That any person who shall, within the limits of the United States or any place subject to the jurisdiction thereof, willfully and maliciously kill or cause the death of the President or Vice-President of the United States, or any officer thereof upon whom the powers and duties of the President may devolve under the Constitution and laws, or who shall willfully and maliciously cause the death of the sovereign or chief magistrate of any foreign country, shall be punished with death.]

[SEC. 2. That any person who shall, within the limits of the United States or any place subject to the jurisdiction thereof, attempt to commit either of the offenses mentioned in the foregoing section shall be punished with death.]

[SEC. 3. That any person who shall, within the limits of the United States or any place subject to the jurisdiction thereof, aid, abet, advise, or counsel the killing of the President or Vice-President of the United States, or any officer thereof upon whom the powers and duties of the President may devolve under the Constitution and laws, or shall conspire with any other person to accomplish the same, or who shall aid, abet, advise, or counsel the killing of the sovereign or chief magistrate of any foreign country, or shall conspire with any other person to accomplish the same, shall be punished by imprisonment not exceeding twenty years.]

[SEC. 4. That any person who has conspired as aforesaid may be indicted and convicted separately, although the other party or parties to the conspiracy are not indicted or convicted.]

[SEC. 5. That any person who shall, within the limits of the United States or any place subject to the jurisdiction thereof, by spoken words, or by written or printed words, uttered or published, threaten to kill or advise or counsel another to kill the President or Vice-President of the United States, or any officer thereof upon whom the powers and duties of the office of President of the United States may devolve under the Constitution and laws, shall be punished by imprisonment not exceeding ten years.]

[SEC. 6. That any person who shall willfully and knowingly aid in the escape of any person guilty of either of the offenses mentioned in the foregoing sections shall be deemed an accomplice after the fact, and shall be punished as if a principal, although the other party or parties to said offense shall not be indicted or convicted.]

[SEC. 7. That the Secretary of War is authorized and directed to select and detail from the Regular Army a sufficient number of officers and men to guard and protect the person of the President of the United States without any unnecessary display.]

[And the Secretary of War is authorized and directed to make special rules and regulations as to dress, arms, and equipment and duties of said guard, and shall publish only such parts of said rules and regulations as he may deem proper.]

[That the additional expenses of such guard so detailed shall be paid out of the Treasury, on accounts to be certified by the Secretary of War to the Secretary of the Treasury.] That any person who unlawfully, purposely, and knowingly kills the President of the United States while he is engaged in the performance of his official duties, or because of his official character, or because of any of his official acts or omissions, shall suffer death.

SEC. 2. That any person who unlawfully, purposely, and knowingly kills the Vice-President of the United States, or any officer of the United States entitled by law to succeed to the Presidency, while he is engaged in the performance of his official duties, or because of his official character, or because of any of his official acts or omissions, shall suffer death.

SEC. 3. That any person who unlawfully, purposely, and knowingly kills any ambassador or minister of a foreign state or country accredited to the United States, and being therein, and while engaged in the performance of his official duties, or because of his official character, or because of any of his official acts or omissions, shall suffer death.

SEC. 4. That any person who attempts to commit either of the offenses defined in sections 1, 2, and 3 of this act shall be imprisoned not less than ten years.

SEC. 5. That any person who, while engaged in an unlawful attempt to inflict grievous bodily harm upon the President of the United States, or the Vice-President of the United States, or any officer entitled by law to succeed to the Presidency, while he is engaged in the performance of his official duties, or because of his official character, or because of any of his official acts or omissions, inflicts injuries on such President, Vice-President, or other officer which cause death, shall be imprisoned for life. If such injuries do not cause death, such offender shall be imprisoned not less than five years.

SEC. 6. That any person who aids, abets, incites, or conspires with another to commit either of the offenses mentioned in sections 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 of this act shall be deemed a principal offender.

SEC. 7. That any person who knowingly harbors, conceals, or aids, with intent that he may avoid or escape from arrest, trial, conviction, or punishment, any person who has committed either of the offenses mentioned in the preceding sections of this act shall be imprisoned for not less than one nor more than twenty-five years.

SEC. 8. That any person who advocates, advises, or teaches the duty, necessity, or propriety of the unlawful killing or assaulting of one or more of the officers (either of specific individuals or officers generally) of the Government of the United States, or of the government of any civilized nation, because of his or their official character, or who openly, willfully, and deliberately justifies such killing or assaulting, with intent to cause the commission of any of the offenses specified in the first nine sections of this act, shall be fined not less than $500 nor more than $5,000, or imprisoned not less than one nor more than twenty years, or both.

SEC. 9. That any person who conspires with any other person or persons, or requests, advises, or encourages any other person or persons to unlawfully assault or kill, within or without the United States, the chief executive or chief magistrate of any other civilized nation having an organized government, because of his official character, shall be punished as follows: If an attempt to commit such act is made and the death of any person results therefrom, such offender shall suffer death. If such attempt does not result in death, such offender shall be fined not less than $500 nor more than $5,000, or be imprisoned not less than five nor more than twenty-five years, or both. If such attempt is not made, such offender shall be fined not less than $500 nor more than $5,000, or be imprisoned not less than one nor more than five years, or both.

SEC. 10. That this act shall apply to all offenses hereinbefore specified when committed within any State or other place subject to the jurisdiction of the United States.

SEC. 11. That no person who disbelieves in or who is opposed to all organized government, or who is a member of or affiliated with any organization entertaining and teaching such disbelief in or opposition to all organized government, or who advocates or teaches the duty, necessity, or propriety of the unlawful assaulting or killing of any officer or officers, either of specific individuals or of officers generally, of the Government of the United States or of any other organized government, because of his or their official character, shall be permitted to enter the United States or any Territory or place subject to the jurisdiction thereof. This section shall be enforced by the Secretary of the Treasury under such rules and regulations as he shall prescribe: Provided, That no such person shall be allowed to enter as an immigrant.

That any person who knowingly aids or assists any such person to enter the United States or any Territory or place subject to the jurisdiction thereof, or who connives or conspires with any person or persons to allow, procure, or permit any such person to enter therein, except pursuant to such rules and regulations made by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall be fined not less than $500 nor more than $5,000, or imprisoned for not less than one nor more than five years, or both.

SEC. 12. That no person who disbelieves in or who is opposed to all organized government, or who is a member of or affiliated with any organization entertaining and teaching such disbelief in or opposition to all organized government, or who advocates or teaches the duty, necessity, or propriety of the unlawful assaulting or killing of any officer or officers, either of specific individuals or of officers generally, of the Government of the United States or of any other organized government, because of his or their official character, or who has violated any of the provisions of this act, shall be naturalized or be made a citizen of the United States.

All courts and tribunals and all judges and officers thereof having jurisdiction of naturalization proceedings or duties to perform in regard thereto shall, on the final application for naturalization, make careful inquiry into such matters, and before issuing the final order or certificate of naturalization cause to be entered of record the affidavit of the applicant and of his witnesses so far as applicable, reciting and affirming the truth of every material fact requisite for naturalization. All final orders and certificates of naturalization hereafter made shall show on their face specifically that said affidavits were duly made and recorded, and all orders and certificates that fail to show such facts shall be null and void.

That any person who procures naturalization in violation of the provisions of this section shall be fined not less than $500 nor more than $5,000, or shall be imprisoned not less than one nor more than ten years, or both, and the court in which such conviction is had shall thereupon adjudge and declare the order or decree and all certificates admitting such person to citizenship null and void. Jurisdiction is hereby conferred on the courts having jurisdiction of the trial of such offense to make such adjudication.

That any person who knowingly aids, advises, or encourages any such person to apply for or to secure naturalization, or to file the preliminary papers declaring an intent to become a citizen of the United States, or who in any naturalization proceeding knowingly procures or gives false testimony as to any material fact, or who makes an affidavit false as to any material fact required to be proved in such proceeding, shall be fined not less than five hundred nor more than five thousand dollars, or imprisoned not less than one nor more than ten years, or both.

SEC. 13. That in all prosecutions under the provisions of the first seven sections of this act it shall be presumed, until the contrary is proved, that the President of the United States, or Vice-President of the United States, or other officer of the United States entitled by law to succeed to the Presidency, as the case may be, was, at the time of the commission of the alleged offense, engaged in the performance of his official duties. Nothing in this act contained shall be construed as an admission or declaration that there is a time when either of such officers, during the tenure of his office, is not engaged in the performance of his official duties.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. MERCER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 5140. An act granting an increase of pension to Dudley Cary; and

S. 6040. An act granting an increase of pension to John W. Craine.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 7034. An act for the relief of Navajo County, Ariz.;

H. R. 8736. An act ratifying the act of the Territorial legislature of Arizona approved March 2, 1901, providing a fund for the erection of additional buildings for the University of Arizona;

H. R. 10819. An act for the relief of George T. Winston, president of the North Carolina College of Agriculture and Mechanic Arts, and W. S. Primrose, chairman board of trustees;

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 13676) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 4071) granting an increase of pension to George C. Tillman.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 4927) granting an increase of pension to Hattie M. Whitney.

PROTECTION OF THE PRESIDENT.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that we dispense with the reading of the Senate bill and come at once to the substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the Senate bill for amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, before that matter is decided, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The Judiciary Committee reported a substitute for the Senate bill. Now, my inquiry is whether the substitute will be read for amendment, and is an amendment eligible after each section is read?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state, in the first instance, that the Senate bill must be read by sections for amendment; that, however, can be waived by unanimous consent. Then amendments will be competent to the sections of the Senate bill. When that is disposed of the substitute offered by the House will be read, which is one amendment, and that amendment will be pending, and amendments may be offered to the amendment that is pending.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The inquiry, Mr. Chairman, was this: Can amendments be offered to the substitute before the entire substitute is read?

The CHAIRMAN. They can not unless by unanimous consent.

Mr. RAY of New York. As I understand, each section must be amended as reached.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] asks unanimous consent that the reading of the Senate bill by sections may be dispensed with. Is there objection?

Mr. LACEY. I object.

The Clerk read the following sections of the Senate bill:

Be it enacted, etc., That any person who shall, within the limits of the United States or any place subject to the jurisdiction thereof, willfully and maliciously kill or cause the death of the President or Vice-President of the United States, or any officer thereof upon whom the powers and duties of the President may devolve under the Constitution and laws, or who shall willfully and maliciously cause the death of the sovereign or chief magistrate of any foreign country, shall be punished with death.

SEC. 2. That any person who shall, within the limits of the United States or any place subject to the jurisdiction thereof, attempt to commit either of the offenses mentioned in the foregoing section shall be punished with death.

SEC. 3. That any person who shall, within the limits of the United States or any place subject to the jurisdiction thereof, aid, abet, advise, or counsel the killing of the President or Vice-President of the United States or any officer thereof upom whom the powers and duties of the President may devolve under the Constitution and laws, or shall conspire with any other person to accomplish the same, or who shall aid, abet, advise, or counsel the killing of the sovereign or chief magistrate of any foreign country, or shall conspire with any other person to accomplish the same, shall be punished by imprisonment not exceeding twenty years.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, what has become of the amendment to strike out the whole of the first section?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment reported by the committee is one amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert a substitute. But these several sections may be amended as we go along.

Mr. COCHRAN. I move to amend by striking out the last word. It goes without saying, Mr. Chairman, that this bill will be enacted into law by the concurrence of both sides of the Chamber, and by an overwhelming majority of the members of this body.

Mr. RAY of New York. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I did not understand that we were to have any more discussion until the amendment of the committee was read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] has moved to strike out the last word.

Mr. RAY of New York. Has the entire amendment been read?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk is reading the original Senate bill, the bill now pending before the committee. The Chair has ruled that the entire Senate bill——

Mr. COCHRAN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Have I the floor?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] has made a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. COCHRAN. Then I want it understood that my five minutes are not being used up in this way.

Mr. RAY of New York. I simply wanted to know the order of proceeding. I understood the Chair to hold that the proposition to strike out the Senate bill was one amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary is one amendment—to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert a substitute for the entire bill. Now, the rule is that we must perfect the original bill before the substitute is voted upon.

Mr. RAY of New York. I understand that; but, as I understood, the Chair was now about to recognize the gentleman from Missouri before the reading of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri himself offers an amendment to perfect the original bill, which he has the right to do, just as it would be entirely competent to move to strike out any one of these sections as read, or to add words or to strike out words, or to insert a new section. When the end of the bill is reached, then the amendment proposed by the committee will be in order.

Mr. RAY of New York. If it is all one amendment, how can we commence to discuss it before it has been read?

The CHAIRMAN. The "one amendment" to which the gentleman refers has not yet been offered and can not be offered until the Senate bill is read through, for the manifest reason that the amendment proposes to strike out the entire bill.

Mr. RAY of New York. Now, the parliamentary inquiry is this: During the reading of the measure which we propose to strike out is it proper to stop at the end of each section and amend that section?

The CHAIRMAN. It certainly is. The Chair so rules. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] will proceed.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, it may be taken for granted that this bill will pass without very much division on this floor. This is evidenced by the fact that we have been allowed three days in which to debate it. Who expects that a measure about which there was any disagreement on this floor will be discussed for three days?

Why, sir, had there been a division on party lines on this question that august, interesting, and useful instrument of repression known as the Committee on Rules would have brought in a rule prohibiting the right of amendment, limiting debate to two or three hours, and the triumvirate would have justified the ruling on the ground that it is useless to waste the time of this body in useless discussion. Instead of three days we would have been limited to about two hours, and had the measure originated in the House it would have been sent over to the Senate to be amended and perfected there.

When the country witnesses this discussion of three days and notices the fact that the distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] held forth for a full hour and three-quarters at the end of a three days' discussion, and, reading the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, discovers that had this bill been read the very day it was brought in here and the roll called, it would have received an overwhelming majority of the membership, it may learn therefrom the kind of measures and upon which the right of free and full discussion is accorded to the members of this body.

I want to congratulate the gentlemen on that side who are charged with the conduct of public affairs upon the fact that once in a while a measure comes in here upon which opinion is so united that they dare to send it to the country with their reasons fully stated for indorsing it, and I want to congratulate them also upon the fact that once in a while a measure comes upon this floor where they do not fear discussion.

This measure would pass this body by an overwhelming vote, discussion or no discussion, and receive the approbation of the country, discussion or no discussion. Why discuss it so elaborately for three long days, when both sides of the Chamber almost unanimously agree that at least the purpose and object of the bill are entirely praiseworthy and deserving of support?

If every member of this body has not lent it their unqualified support it is because some of them doubt the propriety of legislation clothing the Federal courts with jurisdiction of offenses committed in States. Furthermore, up to this writing experience and observation has shown that whoever lifts his finger against the Chief Magistrate of this country is sure of condign punishment. Undoubtedly it is true that nothing could kill Czolgosz more effectually than he was killed by a New York sheriff.

As to whether the passage of repressive legislation will suppress anarchy in this country, I have my own particular views. I believe that as long as we open our ports to all kinds of immigration, as long as our industrial affairs are so ordered that after admitting unnumbered thousands of unfit immigrants into this country and piling them up by scores in single rooms in tenement houses and garrets in our cities and impounding them in improper quarters in mining regions, where they have no opportunity, even if they had the desire, to learn the nature and beneficence of our institutions, and few of whom desire to become Americans for the sake of being Americans, you will have anarchists in this country.

Anarchy is the child of misery. The accursed creed can find no lodgment in the mind of a man reared in our country, unless he is an utter pervert, but if we are going to allow the steamship companies and the corporation agents to ransack the four corners of the earth for the unfit, to bring them here in enormous numbers, and thrust them upon our people, investing them with the elective franchise and threatening our laborers with reduction to their level, depend upon it you have not heard the last of anarchy. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. TIRRELL having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. B. F. BARNES, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

On June 3, 1902:

H. R. 10144. An act to donate to the State of Alabama the spars of the captured battle ships Don Juan d'Austria and Almirante Oquendo; and

H. R. 989. An act to authorize the Light-House Board to pay to Chamblin, Delaney & Scott the sum of $1,704.46 cents.

On June 5, 1902:

H. R. 8752. An act authorizing the board of supervisors of Santa Cruz County, Ariz., to issue bonds for the erection of a court-house and jail for said county; and

H. J. Res. 113. Joint resolution authorizing the use and improvement of Governors Island, Boston Harbor.

On June 6, 1902:

H. J. Res. 172. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to loan to the Morgan Memorial Association, of Winchester, Va., certain Revolutionary trophies at Allegheny Arsenal, Pittsburg, Pa.;

H. R. 357. An act for the relief of Levi Maxted;

H. R. 2901. An act to remove the charge of desertion borne opposite the name of Abram Williams;

H. R. 13359. An act making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 14018. An act to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, and for other purposes.

PROTECTION OF THE PRESIDENT.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That the Secretary of War is authorized and directed to select and detail from the Regular Army a sufficient number of officers and men to guard and protect the person of the President of the United States without any unnecessary display.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. OLMSTED. If we permit the reading of all of the sections of this bill without amendment, and then vote down the committee amendment striking out the whole bill and inserting other matter, shall we have lost the opportunity of amending the Senate bill?

The CHAIRMAN. Most undoubtedly. There is nothing left of the Senate bill to amend except section 7.

Mr. OLMSTED. Then I want to call attention to my first parliamentary inquiry, when the Chair stated there was an amendment pending to strike out the whole of the first section. The Chair, as I understand, replied that the whole bill should first be read. I wish now, if it is not too late, to make the point that the committee amendment must be considered as applying only in the first instance to the first section read, and must be voted upon.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania could hardly have misinterpreted the Chair.

Mr. OLMSTED. Perhaps I did not hear distinctly.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair stated that the original bill, the Senate bill, was the bill under consideration in the House, and that it would be read through, subject to amendment, prior to the proposition to strike out all after the enacting clause; and section by section it has been read, excepting section 7, in the midst of which we now are.

Mr. OLMSTED. Then I will ask unanimous consent to go back to the first section for the purpose of striking out two words.

The CHAIRMAN. Will not the gentleman wait until this section has been disposed of? Then the Chair will recognize the gentleman to make the request.

The Clerk read as follows:

And the Secretary of War is authorized and directed to make special rules and regulations as to dress, arms, and equipment and duties of said guard, and shall publish only such parts of said rules and regulations as he may deem proper.

That the additional expenses of such guard so detailed shall be paid out of the Treasury, on accounts to be certified by the Secretary of War to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section read.

The CHAIRMAN. Section 7?

Mr. RAY of New York. No; to strike out all of the sections read. We have now read down to the end of section 7.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I raise the point of order upon the motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman need not make the point of order. That can not be done. We are taking this section by section. We are now on the seventh section. If the gentleman has any motion to make to amend that section or to strike it out, it is in order.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I desire to move to strike out this section.

Mr. RAY of New York. Wait a moment. Let me understand the Chairman of the committee. I understand the Chair to hold that the other sections are agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. They are not agreed to, for the simple reason that there is pending an amendment, recommended by the committee, to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert other matter in the nature of a substitute; but the other sections of the Senate bill have been passed over, so far as the perfecting of them is concerned——

Mr. RAY of New York. Is there not an amendment pending?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will repeat what he has said. The other sections have been passed by the committee, for the purpose of perfecting the pending bill. They are now perfected, so far as they stand in the bill. The gentleman from New York can now move to strike this section out or to amend this section. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] has already moved to strike it out. When that is disposed of the Chair will entertain the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED]. The gentleman from Indiana moves to strike out section 7.

Mr. RAY of New York. I should like to know, Mr. Chairman, if I can, when the time comes, for this amendment——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has ruled upon that. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] moves to strike out section 7 of the bill.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I want to say a word on this section. I think it ought to go out of the bill, so that in the event that the Committee of the Whole votes down the substitute or House bill the bill will be in fairly acceptable shape. This section provides for a sort of military bodyguard of unlimited size, to be uniformed and decorated in such manner as the Secretary of War sees fit. I think the section ought to go out of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana, to strike out section 7 of the Senate bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Now the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] asks unanimons consent to recur to the first section of the bill for the purpose of offering an amendment which the gentleman will state.

Mr. OLMSTED. Striking out the words "who shall," in line 8.

Mr. RAY of New York. To that I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made. The question now is upon the motion of the committee, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following, which the Clerk will read.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I want to know when it will be in order to offer amendments to the substitute?

The CHAIRMAN. At the end of the reading of the entire substitute, which the Chair holds to be one amendment.

Mr. PARKER. May we give notice of these amendments?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not necessary to give notice.

Mr. PARKER. As a member of the committee, I desire to offer an amendment to the first, second, and third sections.

The CHAIRMAN. After the committee amendment has been read the Chair will recognize all gentlemen to offer amendments to it.

The Clerk proceeded to read the substitute, as follows:

That any person who unlawfully, purposely, and knowingly kills the President of the United States while he is engaged in the performance of his official duties, or because of his official character, or because of any of his official acts or omissions, shall suffer death.

Mr. LANHAM. Now, Mr. Chairman, at the proper time I wish to move to strike out this section of the House bill and offer an amended section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Texas that the Chair holds this amendment reported by the committee to be one amendment, and at the end of the reading of that amendment it is subject to amendment at any place in the amendment.

Mr. LANHAM. And then I can be recognized to strike out any section of the bill I may see proper?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Mr. THAYER. Can not we expedite matters? We all know what this substitute is, and I ask unanimous consent that it be not read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the substitute be not read. Is there objection?

Mr. FINLEY. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made by the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that amendments may be offered at the end of each section, so that we may understand better what we are doing.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent that the substitute be considered by sections. Is there objection?

Mr. RAY of New York. Now, Mr. Chairman, before that is done, I want to see if I understand the Chair and the Chair understands us, so that we may know what we are going to do. I will state it as I understand it, if I can have quiet, so that the Chair can distinctly understand me and I understand the Chair. I understand now we have come to the committee amendment, and that we can amend that as we see fit, and after we have amended it, and after this committee has got through with the amendment, they can then substitute it for the first six sections of the Senate bill or not, as they see fit.

The CHAIRMAN. That is correct; and the Chair understands the gentleman from New York.

Mr. RAY of New York. Now we read the House substitute as a whole and then go to work and amend it by offering amendments at any place?

The CHAIRMAN. That is correct, except that now the gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to consider the substitute by sections.

Mr. RAY of New York. But no right will be lost to any gentleman to amend the House substitute by that course.

Mr. LANHAM. I think it will be better to follow the suggestion offered by the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. If the request of the gentleman from New Jersey is agreed to and the committee goes through the bill by sections, it will not then be in order to reamend the amendment. The course will then be to agree to the substitute as amended.

Mr. RAY of New York. The substitute, the House amendment, as amended by this committee, to the Senate bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, let the Chairman be distinctly understood. This is a substitute amendment by sections, and under the rules of the House it makes it necessary to read the entire amendment and then amend it in the different parts at the liberty of the committee. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to consider this substitute by sections for amendments. Is there objection?

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, there are some gentlemen who would like to adopt the Senate part of the amendment already made and add it to the bill—sections 11 and 12—in other words, the anti-anarchy features of the House bill. Will there be an opportunity to do that?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the opportunity is already lost. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, I move an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 3, lines 23 and 24, and lines 1 and 2, page 4, strike out the words "while he is engaged in the performance of his official duties, or because of his official character, or because of any of his official acts or omissions."

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, may we have stated how the section will read?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the section as it will read when amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

That any person who unlawfully, purposely, and knowingly kills the President of the United States shall suffer death.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, I move this amendment here with a good House present, ready to meet the question that we have already discussed. We all believe, and we feel it our duty to the people, that this House ought to declare in the name of the United States that that man shall suffer death who kills the President unlawfully: that is, without a lawful reason, who kills him purposely, and who kills him knowingly.

That man should suffer death if he has no lawful reason, whether or not his reason be to interfere with the President on account of his official action or on account of his official acts or omissions, and this whether he is signing a message and is doing his duty as President or whether he is simply resting and sleeping, recruiting the energies which will allow him to do that duty. It needs no argument. Let us have a vote. We have argued it already. [Applause.]

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, so much has been said by gentlemen opposed to the limitations in this bill to the effect that the decisions do not hold that Congress may enact laws to protect its officers only when they are engaged in the performance of their official duties, or because of their official character, or because of official acts done or omitted, that it is well to call attention specifically to what the courts have held and decided on that subject; also to the concessions made by the learned and distinguished lawyers and jurists who have argued the question in the courts. So far as I can find, it has never been contended by any lawyer of eminence or any jurist anywhere that the power of the United States extends further than I have stated, and further than stated in the bill. Since the murder of President McKinley at Buffalo, yielding to the popular cry and seeking to gratify the public fury awakened by that atrocious act, lawyers and judges have speculated whether or not Congress could go further for the protection of officers of the Government than to protect them in the discharge of their duties and from assaults because of their official character or official acts. They have not held that this could be done.

Turning to the leading case, In re Neagle, 135 U. S., page 1, we find that the case was argued in the Supreme Court of the United States in behalf of the Government of the United States by that learned and distinguished lawyer, the superior of whom is not living, Joseph H. Choate, of New York City, now our ambassador to the Kingdom of Great Britain. The brief of Mr. Choate is full and complete. It was necessary to show, and everyone who has read the case concedes and knows that it was necessary to show, in order to authorize the discharge of Neagle from the custody of the criminal courts of California, which was done, that Mr. Justice Field was at the time of the assault committed upon him engaged in the performance of his official duty, not performing an official act, but engaged in the performance of his official duty, or that he was attacked because of something done by him in his official character or because of his official character. Mr. Choate, representing the United States, conceded this. He says:

What we assert is that it is not only within the lawful power, but is the plain duty, of the President when informed that the due and regular administration of justice on one of the Federal circuits is about to be interfered with by a threatened attack on the Federal judge assigned by law to administer it, and actually engaged in that service, to provide for adequate means for his protection.

Mr. Choate further says:

In obedience to these laws he was at the time and place of the attack traveling from one California circuit, where he had been holding court, to the other, where he was about to hold it. He was therefore at the time and place of the attack in the direct and immediate discharge of his official duties just as much so as if he had been sitting in court in San Francisco.

The learned Attorney-General of the United States, W. H. H. Miller, made the same concession in his brief, and says, when stating the case for the Government and defining the powers of the Government to protect its officers:

It was the duty of the executive department of the United States to guard and protect, at any hazard, the life of Mr. Justice Field in the discharge of his duty.

When the court came to pronounce its decision, it stated clearly and emphatically the grounds, and the only grounds, upon which the Government of the United States could interfere, and says:

This element (of authority asserted under the Government of the United States) is said to be found in the facts that Mr. Justice Field when attacked was in the immediate discharge of his duty as judge of the circuit courts of the United States within California; that the assault upon him grew out of the animosity of Terry and wife arising out of the previous discharge of his duty as circuit justice in the case for which they were committed for contempt of court, and that the deputy marshal of the United States who killed Terry in defense of Field's life was charged with a duty under the law of the United States to protect Field from the violence which Terry was inflicting and which was intended to lead to Field's death.

The court then concedes that the first proposition, to wit, that Mr. Justice Field when attacked was in the immediate discharge of his duty as judge of the circuit court of the United States within California, was absolutely essential to the establishment of the fact that the jurisdiction and power of the United States Government to protect him had been infringed, and then proceeds at length to prove that he was engaged in the performance of his official duties, even though not performing an official act.

No sane man can suppose for an instant that these concessions would have been made by the Attorney-General of the United States and by Mr. Choate and by the entire court had they entertained for a moment the belief that the power of the United States to protect its officers extends to that protection on the ground simply that they are officers of that Government and irrespective of what they are doing at the time or of the reasons of the assault committed upon them.

In the course of the argument, which occupies 36 printed pages, Mr. Justice Miller, in writing the opinion, more than a dozen times states that the power of the United States Government to protect Mr. Justice Field grew out of the fact that he was engaged in the discharge of his official duties, and at page 69 says, "That there is a peace of the United States; that a man assaulting a judge of the Umted States while in the discharge of his duties violates that peace," etc., are questions too clear to need arguments to prove them.

In United States v. Cruikshank (92 U. S., 550–1) the court said, speaking generally of the power of Congress to protect the officers of the Government:

Thus, if a marshal of the United States is unlawfully resisted while executing the process of the courts within a State, and the resistance is accompanied by an assault on the officer, the sovereignty of the United States is violated by the resistance and that of the State by the breach of the peace in the assault. So, too, if one passes counterfeit coin of the United States within a State, it may be an offense against the United States and the State—the United States because it discredits the coin and the State because of the fraud upon him to whom it is passed. This does not, however, necessarily imply that the two governments possess powers in common or bring them into conflict with each other.

In the Neagle case the court further says:

It is urged, however, that there exists no statute authorizing any such protection as that which Neagle was instructed to give Judge Field in the present case, and indeed no protection whatever against a vindictive or malicious assault growing out of the faithful discharge of his official duties; and that the language of section 753 of the Revised Statutes, that the party seeking the benefit of the writ of habeas corpus must in this connection show that he is "in custody for an act done or omitted in pursuance of a law of the United States," makes it necessary that upon this occasion it should be shown that the act for which Neagle is imprisoned was done by virtue of an act of Congress. It is not supposed that any special act of Congress exists which authorizes the marshals or deputy marshals of the United States in express terms to accompany the judges of the Supreme Court through their circuits and act as a bodyguard to them, to defend them against malicious assaults against their persons.

In the view we take of the Constitution of the United States, any obligation fairly and properly inferable from that instrument or any duty of the marshal to be derived from the general scope of his duties under the laws of the United States is "a law" within the meaning of this phrase. It would be a great reproach to the system of government of the United States, declared to be within its sphere sovereign and supreme, if there is to be found within the domain of its powers no means of protecting the judges in the conscientious and faithful discharge of their duties from the malice and hatred of those upon whom their judgments may operate unfavorably.

It is very clear that the President of the United States is not always performing official or Executive acts. He has been criticised for the delivery of the following address, cut from the Washington Post of Saturday, May 31, 1902, and delivered by the President at Arlington May 30, 1902, Memorial Day:

[The Washington Post, Saturday, May 31, 1902.]

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S MEMORIAL ADDRESS.

Mr. Commander, comrades, and you, men and women of the United States, who owe your being here to what was done by the men of the great civil war, I greet you and thank you for the honor done me in asking me to be present this day.

It is a good custom for our country to have certain solemn holidays in commemoration of our greatest men and of the greatest crises in our history. There should be but few such holidays. To increase their number is to cheapen them. Washington and Lincoln—the man who did most to found the Union and the man who did most to preserve it—stand head and shoulders above all our other public men, and have by common consent won the right to this preeminence. Among the holidays which commemorate the turning points in American history Thanksgiving has a significance peculiarly its own. On July 4 we celebrate the birth of the nation, on this day, the 30th of May, we call to mind the deaths of those who died that the nation might live, who wagered all that life holds dear for the great prize of death in battle, who poured out their blood like water in order that the mighty national structure raised by the far-seeing patriotism of Washington, Franklin, Marshall, Hamilton, and the other great leaders of the Revolution, great framers of the Constitution, should not crumble into meaningless ruins.

You whom I address to-day and your comrades who wore the blue beside you in the perilous years during which strong, sad, patient Lincoln bore the crushing load of national leadership, performed the one feat the failure to perform which would have meant destruction to everything which makes the name America a symbol of hope among the nations of mankind. You did the greatest and most necessary task which has ever fallen to the lot of any men on this Western Hemisphere. Nearly three centuries have passed since the waters of our coasts were first furrowed by the keels of the men whose children's children were to inherit this fair land. Over a century and a half of colonial growth followed the settlement, and now for over a century and a quarter we have been a nation.

During our four generations of national life we have had to do many tasks, and some of them of far-reaching importance, but the only really vital task was the one you did, the task of saving the Union. There were other crises in which to have gone wrong would have meant disaster, but this was the one crisis in which to have gone wrong would have meant, not merely disaster, but annihilation. For failure at any other point atonement could have been made, but had you failed in the iron days the loss would have been irreparable, the defeat irretrievable. Upon your success depended all the future of the people on this continent and much of the future of mankind as a whole.

You left us a reunited country. You left us the right of brotherhood with the men in gray, who with such courage and such devotion for what they deemed the right fought against you. But you left us much more even than your achievement, for you left us the memory of how it was achieved. You, who made good by your valor and patriotism the statesmanship of Lincoln and the soldiership of Grant, have set as the standards for our efforts in the future both the way you did your work in war and the way in which, when the war was over, you turned again to the work of peace. In war and in peace alike your example will stand as the wisest of lessons to us and our children and our children's children.

Just at this moment the Army of the United States, led by men who served among you in the great war, is carrying to completion a small but peculiarly trying and difficult war in which is involved, not only the honor of the flag, but the triumph of civilization over forces which stand for the black chaos of savagery and barbarism. The task has not been as difficult or as important as yours; but, oh, my comrades, the men in the uniform of the United States, who have for the last three years patiently and uncomplainingly championed the American cause in the Philippine Islands, are your younger brothers, your sons. They have shown themselves not unworthy of you, and they are entitled to the support of all men who are proud of what you did.

These younger comrades of yours have fought under terrible difficulties and have received terrible provocation from a very cruel and very treacherous enemy. Under the strain of these provocations I deeply deplore to say that some among them have so far forgotten themselves as to counsel and commit, in retaliation, acts of cruelty. The fact that for every guilty act committed by one of our troops a hundred acts of far greater atrocity have been committed by the hostile natives upon our troops, or upon the peaceable and law-abiding natives who are friendly to us, can not be held to excuse any wrongdoer on our side. Determined and unswerving effort must be made, and is being made, to find out every instance of barbarity on the part of our troops, to punish those guilty of it, and to take, if possible, even stronger measures than have already been taken to minimize or prevent the occurrence of all such instances in the future.

Is it only in the army of the Philippines that Americans sometimes do acts that cause the rest of the Americans regret?

From time to time there occur in our country, to the deep and lasting shame of our people, lynchings carried on under circumstances of inhuman cruelty and barbarity—a cruelty infinitely worse than any that has ever been committed by our troops in the Philippines; worse to the victims, and far more brutalizing to those guilty of it. The men who fail to condemn these lynchings, and yet clamor about what has been done in the Philippines, are indeed guilty of neglecting the beam in their own eye, while taunting their brother about the mote in his. Understand me. These lynchings afford us no excuse for failure to stop cruelty in the Philippines. Every effort is being made, and will be made, to minimize the chances of cruelty occurring.

But keep in mind that these cruelties in the Philippines have been wholly exceptional, and have been shamelessly exaggerated. We deeply and bitterly regret that any such cruelties should have been committed, no matter how rarely, no matter under what provocation, by American troops. But they afford far less justification for a general condemnation of our Army than these lynchings afford for the condemnation of the communities in which they have taken place. In each case it is well to condemn the deed, and it is well also to refrain from including both guilty and innocent in the same sweeping condemnation.

In every community there are people who commit acts of well-nigh inconceivable horror and baseness. If we fix our eyes only upon these individuals and upon their acts, and if we forget the far more numerous citizens of upright and honest life and blind ourselves to their countless deeds of wisdom and justice and philanthropy, it is easy enough to condemn the community. There is not a city in this land which we could not thus condemn if we fixed our eyes purely upon its police record and refused to look at what it had accomplished for decency and justice and charity. Yet this is exactly the attitude which has been taken by too many men with reference to our Army in the Philippines; and it is an attitude both absurd and cruelly unjust.

The rules of warfare which have been promulgated by the War Department and accepted as the basis of conduct by our troops in the field are the rules laid pown by Abraham Lincoln when you, my hearers, were fighting for the Union. These rules provide, of course, for the just severity necessary in war. The most destructive of all forms of cruelty would be to show weakness where sternness is demanded by iron need. But all cruelty is forbidden, and all harshness beyond what is called for by need. Our enemies in the Philippines have not merely violated every rule of war, but have made of these violations their only method of carrying on the war. We would have been justified by Abraham Lincoln's rules of war in infinitely greater severity than has been shown. The fact really is that our warfare in the Philippines has been carried on with singular humanity. For every act of cruelty by our men there have been innumerable acts of forbearance, magnanimity, and generous kindness. These are the qualities which have characterized the war as a whole. The cruelties have been wholly exceptional, on our part.

The guilty are to be punished, but in punishing them let those who sit at ease at home, who walk delicately and live in the soft places of the earth, remember also to do them common justice. Let not the effortless and the untempted rail overmuch at strong men who with blood and sweat face years of toil and days and nights of agony, and at need lay down their lives in remote tropic jungles to bring the light of civilization into the world's dark places The warfare that has extended the boundaries of civilization at the expense of barbarism and savagery has been for centuries one of the most potent factors in the progress of humanity. Yet from its very nature it has always and everywhere been liable to dark abuses.

It behooves us to keep a vigilant watch to prevent these abuses and to punish those who commit them; but if because of them we flinch from finishing the task on which we have entered, we show ourselves cravens and weaklings, unworthy of the sires from whose loins we sprang. There were abuses and to spare in the civil war. Your false friends then called Grant a "butcher" and spoke of you who are listening to me as mercenaries, as "Lincoln's hirelings." Your open foes—as in the resolution passed by the Confederate congress in October, 1862—accused you, at great length and with much particularity, of "contemptuous disregard of the usages of civilized war;" of subjecting women and children to "banishment, imprisonment, and death;" of "murder," of "rapine," of "outrages on women," of "lawless cruelty," of "perpetrating atrocities which would be disgraceful to savages;" and Abraham Lincoln was singled out for especial attack because of his "spirit of barbarous ferocity." Verily, these men who thus foully slandered you have their heirs to-day in those who traduce our armies in the Philippines, who fix their eyes on individual deeds of wrong so keenly that at last they become blind to the great work of peace and freedom that has already been accomplished.

Peace and freedom—are there two better objects for which a soldier can fight? Well, these are precisely the objects for which our soldiers are fighting in the Philippines. When there is talk of the cruelties committed in the Philippines, remember always that by far the greater proportion of these cruelties have been committed by the insurgents against their own people, as well as against our soldiers, and that not only the surest but the only effectual way of stopping them is by the progress of the American arms. The victories of the American Army have been the really effective means of putting a stop to cruelty in the Philippines. Wherever these victories have been complete—and such is now the case throughout the greater part of the islands—all cruelties have ceased, and the native is secure in his life, his liberty, and his pursuit of happiness. Where the insurrection still smolders there is always a chance for cruelty to show itself.

Our soldiers conquer; and what is the object for which they conquer? To establish a military government? No. The laws we are now endeavoring to enact for the government of the Philippines are to increase the power and domain of the civil at the expense of the military authorities, and to render even more difficult than in the past the chance of oppression. The military power is used to secure peace in order that it may itself be supplanted by the civil government. The progress of the American arms means the abolition of cruelty, the bringing of peace, and the rule of law and order under the civil government. Other nations have conquered to create irresponsible military rule. We conquer to bring just and responsible civil government to the conquered.

But our armies do more than bring peace, do more than bring order. They bring freedom. Remember always that the independence of a tribe or a community may, and often does, have nothing whatever to do with the freedom of the individual in that tribe or community. There are now in Asia and Africa scores of despotic monarchies, each of which is independent, and in no one of which is there the slightest vestige of freedom for the individual man. Scant indeed is the gain to mankind from the "independence" of a blood-stained tyrant who rules over abject and brutalized slaves. But great is the gain to humanity which follows the steady though slow introduction of the orderly liberty, the law-abiding freedom of the individual, which is the only sure foundation upon which national independence can be built. Wherever in the Philippines the insurrection has been definitely and finally put down there the individual Filipino already enjoys such freedom, such personal liberty, under our rule, as he could never even dream of under the rule of an "independent" Aguinaldian oligarchy.

The slowly learned and difficult art of self-government, an art which our people have taught themselves by the labor of a thousand years, can not be grasped in a day by a people only just emerging from conditions of life which our ancestors left behind them in the dim years before history dawned. We believe that we can rapidly teach the people of the Philippine Islands not only how to enjoy, but how to make good use of their freedom; and with their growing knowledge their growth in self-government shall keep steady pace. When they have thus shown their capacity for real freedom by their power of self-government, then, and not till then, will it be possible to decide whether they are to exist independently of us or be knit to us by ties of common friendship and interest. When that day will come it is not in human wisdom to foretell. All that we can say with certainty is that it would be put back an immeasurable distance if we should yield to the counsels of unmanly weakness and turn loose the islands, to see our victorious foes butcher with revolting cruelty our betrayed friends, and shed the blood of the most humane, the most enlightened, the most peaceful, the wisest, and the best of their own number—for these are the classes who have already learned to welcome our rule.

Nor, while fully acknowledging our duties to others, need we forget our duty to our own country. The Pacific seaboard is as much to us as the Atlantic; as we grow in power and prosperity so our interests will grow in that farthest west which is the immemorial east. The shadow of our destiny has already reached to the shores of Asia. The might of our people already looms large against the world horizon, and it will loom ever larger as the years go by. No statesman has a right to neglect the interests of our people in the Pacific; interests which are important to all our people, but which are of most importance to those of our people who have built populous and thriving States on the western slope of our continent.

This should be no more a party question than the war for the Union should have been a party question. At this moment the man in highest office in the Philippine Islands is the vice-governor, Gen. Luke Wright, of Tennessee, who gallantly wore the gray in the civil war and who is now working hand in hand with the head of our army in the Philippines, Adna Chaffee, who in the civil war gallantly wore the blue. Those two, and the men under them, from the North and from the South, in civil life and in military life, as teachers, as administrators, as soldiers, are laboring mightily for us who live at home. Here and there black sheep are to be found among them; but taken as a whole they represent as high a standard of public service as this country has ever seen. They are doing a great work for civilization, a great work for the honor and the interest of this nation, and above all, for the welfare of the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands. All honor to them; and shame, thrice shame, to us if we fail to uphold their hands!

The delivery of that able and patriotic address was not an Executive or an official act, but who will say he was not even there engaged in the performance of his official duties? He had power at that time to halt in his remarks to sign or give orders to the Army, to give directions for the performance of executive acts by his subordinates.

Had he been assaulted or killed while delivering that address the offense would have been within this proposed law if on the statute books.

The danger of these words of limitation are wholly imaginary. In the Cruikshank case the case involved the question of the constitutionality of a law, not its construction. The question was the power of Congress to legislate for the protection of persons within a State, and hence the dividing line between the sovereignty of the State and that of the United States in defining and punishing offenses against anyone was necessarily to be determined, and was determined by the Supreme Court, Mr. Justice Waite giving the opinion of the court. Those who for present political effect would write a law in the book known to be of doubtful constitutionality are not legislating wisely.

It is far better to be safe in our legislation, for it might be a calamity to enact an unconstitutional statute on this subject.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I very much hope this amendment will not obtain. When this section was proposed in the Judiciary Committee I think every man, certainly every Republican member of the committee, was opposed to it, with the possible exception of the chairman, who had given it long and careful study before it was brought to our attention; but the more we studied the question the more important and necessary became these words of limitation. I am not going to discuss the constitutional question, which has already been dwelt upon long and ably by the chairman of the committee and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. POWERS] and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD]. They have gone over it line upon line and decision after decision until the law ought to be knocked into the head of every man in the House if it was not there before. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, gentlemen object to these words of limitation, especially the phrase "while he is engaged in the performance of his official duties," fearing that it will place upon the Government the burden of proving that he is engaged in the performance of an official duty, notwithstanding section 13 of the bill, which provides that it shall be presumed until the contrary is proven that the President or other officer included in the bill was, at the time of the commission of the offense, engaged in the performance of his official duties. It is possible a case might arise when the President, at the time of assault, might not be in the performance of his official duties. Every case that the ingenuity of man can fancy has been used in illustration, but none of them within the range of probability, or even possibility, seemed to have established an exception to the rule laid down by the courts that an officer is in the discharge of his official duty at any time when he is charged with the performance of that duty.

A distinguished lawyer supposes that the President goes to New York on business and stops at a private house overnight where no one knew him or of his official character. While he is asleep a burglar breaks into his chamber, and the President resists the burglar, and the burglar, not knowing who he is or his official charactor, kills him.

Yet the gentleman admits that although this is a case where the President is not actively engaged in the performance of his official duties, still he is charged with the official duties, and therefore he is in and about the discharge of his official duties, and this law would protect him and protect the Government.

The able chairman of the Judiciary Committee is authority for the statement that the Supreme Court of the United States has decided in several cases that the officer is in the discharge of his official duty at any time when he is charged with the performance of that duty. So far as concerns the President, it is almost impossible to conceive a condition of circumstances when he is not so engaged. The executive authority is vested in him, and it is his duty to execute the law at all times and to see that it is executed, and therefore there is no time when he is not engaged in and about the performance of his official duties.

While so engaged he may be doing other things—eating, sleeping, walking, riding, going to church, or to theater for recreation, or amusing children, for illustration. These may not be official acts, but he does not cease to be officially acting, as the Supreme Court suggests in the Neagle case. "We are of the opinion," says the majority report of the Judiciary Committee, "that the President of the United States, from the moment his term of office commences to the moment his term ends, is engaged in the performance of his official duties necessarily; that the courts must and would so hold as a matter of law because of the powers vested in and duties imposed upon him."

But why, then, raise the question of the President being officially engaged, it is asked, by inserting words of limitation in the bill, since the President is the constitutional means of carrying on the operations of the Government, and therefore his assassination at any time, anywhere, or regardless of what he may be doing, deprives the Federal Government of the constitutional agency of carrying on and executing its laws?

This is all very well in theory, and it would be an easy solution of the matter if it were absolutely good law; but there are many able lawyers who do not believe that the President is always, everywhere, and under all circumstances engaged in the performance of his official duties, and they think it wise and better to set aside experimental legislation and deal only with safe legislation.

Now, why are these words "while he is engaged in the performance of his official duties" inserted in this section of the bill and in the four subsequent sections of the measure? The explanation is neither mysterious nor difficult, but plain and simple.

No one denies that the United States is without jurisdiction of the crime of murder or assault committed in a State unless the sovereignty of the United States is violated by being resisted or attacked, and such sovereignty is resisted or attacked only when an officer of the United States is opposed or interfered with in the performance or because of the performance of his duty. In other words, if one resist an officer for what he is doing or attacks him for what he has done, he attacks and infringes upon the sovereignty of the United States. This gives the United States jurisdiction in the case.

Mr. Chairman, there is no difference between the President of the United States and a United States marshal, so far as Federal jurisdiction is concerned. The President is greater in degree, but Federal jurisdiction is acquired within a State where the President is killed the same as when a United States marshal is killed.

Mr. TAWNEY. Are not the duties of the two officers defined in a different way? Are not the duties of a United States marshal defined by statute, while the duties of the President of the United States are defined by the Constitution?

Mr. ALEXANDER. That is true, but Federal jurisdiction in a State is obtained over one exactly as it is over the others. The sovereignty of the United States must be infringed or resisted, and it is resisted in the case of a United States marshal the same at it is in the case of the President.

Mr. TAWNEY. Is not the President a representative of the sovereignty of the people at all times during his occupancy of the Presidential office?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Oh, it is all very well to talk about "a representative of the sovereignty;" but sovereignty must be infringed and resisted before the Federal courts can have jurisdiction of a crime committed within the jurisdiction of a State.

Mr. TAWNEY. Is not that sovereignty infringed when the life of the representative of that sovereignty is taken, no matter where or under what circumstances?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Well, I hold that President McKinley was in the performance of his official duties when his life was taken at Buffalo.

Mr. TAWNEY. So do I.

Mr. ALEXANDER. But there are eminent men in this country who do not so believe. I believe that President Lincoln was in the performance of his official duties when he was stricken in a theater; but there are eminent lawyers in this country who do not so believe. Every decision of the Supreme Court of the United States clearly indicates that Congress has jurisdiction to enact laws punishing offenses against and assaults committed upon officers of the United States only when they are engaged in the performance of their official duties or when the assault is made because of their official character or because of an official act done or omitted.

The killing or assaulting of a United States officer simply because he is an officer would be insufficient to bring the crime within the jurisdiction of the United States. In the Neagle case the court held "that in the protection of the person and the life of Mr. Justice Field, while in the discharge of his official duties, Neagle was authorized to resist the attack of Terry upon him."

The decision also clearly holds that if Terry had attacked Justice Field because of his prior official act or because of his official character, the offense would have been against the sovereignty of the United States, and that Neagle would have had the right to resist it. There was no law of Congress punishing the killing of a justice of the Supreme Court when such killing occurred within a State. The Supreme Court simply defined what constitutes a breach of the sovereignty of the United States under the Constitution by reason of an assault on an officer of the United States when engaged in the performance of his official duties.

At the time of the attempted assault Justice Field was engaged in eating his breakfast. Was this being engaged in the performance of such duties? The court regarded this point so material that the opinion considers it at length, to the extent of two or three pages, showing that it was important, if not vital, and the court held that Justice Field was acting in his official capacity as justice even when eating his breakfast at the hotel on his way to hold court in a distant city.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it may be, and probably is, true that the President is always engaged, constructively or otherwise, in the performance of his official duties, but a statute of the United States defining and punishing an offense against the United States, when the act is committed within a State, ought to be so framed as to show on its face that it can only apply to offenses of which the United States has jurisdiction.

Hence the importance, if it be true that there is a time when the President is not engaged in the discharge of his official duties, that the words of limitation be included in the act. It is well enough to theorize and philosophize, but when a safe way is marked out through decisions of the Supreme Court, it seems unwise to attempt to find a shorter and easier one through theoretical constitutional constructions. [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RAY of New York. Now I rise to a point of order; it is that debate on this amendment is exhausted. I call for a vote.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I move to amend by striking out the last word.

Mr. RAY of New York. I raise the point of order that that is not in order. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] has proposed an amendment, which has been read, and has been discussed on both sides. I now call for a vote.

Mr. OLMSTED. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey by striking out also the word "shall."

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I have been recognized, I believe.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky is not in order because it is an amendment in the third degree. The Chair will sustain the point of order. The gentleman from Kentucky will be at liberty later to offer an original amendment.

Mr. PARKER. May I ask unanimous consent to close debate?

Mr. RAY of New York. I make the point that debate is already exhausted and we are entitled to a vote on the amendment.

Mr. PARKER. Very well.

Mr. PAYNE. I ask unanimous consent that the debate may extend for fifteen minutes.

Mr. RAY of New York. If that time is to be equally divided, I have no objection.

Mr. PARKER. In that case we shall have to adjourn before the vote is taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] asks unanimous consent that debate on this amendment be extended for fifteen minutes.

Mr. PARKER. I want to get a vote on this question to-night. I object to fifteen minutes; I will consent to ten.

Mr. OLMSTED. I object to ten. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] to strike out from section 1 the words which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

While he is engaged in the performance of his official duties, or because of his official character, or because of any of his official acts or omissions.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 71, noes 73.

Mr. PARKER. I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. PARKER and Mr. RAY of New York were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 63, noes 89.

So the amendment of Mr. PARKER was rejected.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out of section 1 of the substitute the words "unlawfully, purposely, and knowingly" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "wilfully and with malice aforethought."

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, one of the objections to this bill, in my opinion, is in the fact that it fixes a greater punishment for the killing of a President than it does for the killing of a private citizen. I believe that as a matter of sound public policy a man ought to be punished as much for the killing of one as he ought to be punished for the killing of another person. The fact that a man is the President of the United States does not any more justify the fixing of a death penalty for the crime of manslaughter committed upon his person than it does to authorize the death penalty for the crime of manslaughter against a private citizen. In other words, let us have one common punishment for the same criminal act, whether it is to be tried in the Federal court or whether it is cognizable in a State court.

I believe that it is entirely proper to pass the jurisdiction of these offenses over to the Federal courts, but I want to fix for the commission of these crimes the same punishment that the judgment of the people throughout nearly all of the States of the Union have fixed for the commission of the like crimes. This first section of the substitute will include in it many grades of what is known in the States as manslaughter. I venture the assertion here that it includes grades of homicide that are not punished in any State of this Union by death, and some that are not in some States punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary. Then, why, gentlemen of the committee, should you punish with death when committed here? I believe, Mr. Chairman, that this first section ought to be amended so as to require that the killing of the President to be set out therein shall be equivalent to the crime of murder as defined by the common law, and then give to it the punishment usually fixed for murder. One good feature of this bill is to be found in the uniformity that it secures in the punishment of these crimes against the President.

It may be admitted that this bill very properly passes the jurisdiction from the State to the Federal courts to try the crimes defined in it. I believe as a sound proposition of political economy that the Federal Government ought to have the power to punish offenses committed against itself. I believe the striking down of an official of the Federal Government is a crime against it, and I am perfectly willing that the Federal courts shall have the jurisdiction of such crimes; but I insist that in fixing the penalty you shall fix the penalty that the consensus of opinion of the intelligent people of this country throughout all the States has fixed for a like crime, and when that is done you have done your full duty, in my opinion. [Applause.]

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Kentucky, a member of the committee, proposes to strike out the words "purposely and knowingly" and substitute the words "wilfully and with malice aforethought." Now, I desire to say, and I think that I violate no confidence when I say it, that the committee first had in the bill the words "with malice aforethought." Those words are not easily understood by laymen. Of course lawyers and men familiar with legal phraseology know what they mean. These words used in the bill would embrace a little more and reach further than the words proposed, perhaps.

Now, we use the word "unlawfully," and why? Simply to show that the person shall not be punished if his act is either excusable or justifiable. "Purposely and knowingly." Now, to state that if a man purposely kills the President and knowingly does it, the words, to an extent, are a repetition and approach tautology, but if you look up the legal meaning of the two words in criminal law, you will find they are not identical in import or meaning. Therefore we retained the two. They are stronger than the words "with malice aforethought." The words used by the committee would embrace some killings of the President to be punished with death, would punish with death some slayers of the President that the words of the gentleman from Kentucky would not.

Mr. PALMER. What words?

Mr. RAY of New York. I will not stop now to define. The man who has taken the cases and read the definitions of those two words in legal phraseology will find, as the gentleman from Kentucky said, that the words we use in this bill would embrace what in some States is defined as manslaughter only, or murder in the second degree, but the words he proposes to substitute could only include a killing when you are able to prove that the act was committed with malice aforethought and from a premeditated and deliberate design to effect the death of the President. The gentleman [Mr. PALMER] asks "what words?" The words used by the committee, the meaning of which are plain to most men, and I trust their meaning is not unknown t othe gentleman.

We think that is requiring too much, and therefore I ask the committee to retain these words, because we believe they are not too strong, but because they are stronger than the words proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH] for the prevention of crime against the Government and against the President of the United States. We think the use of these words is wise, and as they were taken from the bill proposed by the Attorney-General of the United States we claim no proprietorship. We want a constitutional bill, and the decided vote of this committee shows that, but the use of the words proposed expresses the idea plainly, and there can be no difficulty in understanding them, and their use does not violate any principle of law. Read the statute to a jury, "unlawfully, purposely, and knowingly," and each man knows what is intended. Give him the words "with malice aforethought" and he is at sea, and the judge must explain, and even then some men will be in the dark.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the first section.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman will forward his amendment to the desk, it will be offered and remain unacted upon until the section is perfected.

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Chairman, I should like to have added to the section the matter which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of section 1 the following:

"The President of the United States, the Vice-President of the United States, or other officers of the United States entitled by law to succeed to the Presidency, shall be considered as being in the performance of their official duties during the tenure of their respective offices."

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Chairman, to my mind it is absolutely and utterly impossible to divorce the individual from the office. The man who strikes at the individual while he occupies the position of President, Vice-President, or any of the officers in the line of succession, strikes at the head of this Government, and all of the results which follow are the same, no matter whether the crime is committed while the victim is performing his official duties or while he is performing a private function. Therefore I would like to have the amendment adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORRELL].

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, the amendment would not be so very objectionable, perhaps, although I could not hear it carefully, but it is simply a repetition of what the committee has proposed in section 13, which I will not take the time to read, only it is not nearly as broad as section 13 proposed by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. MORRELL) there were—ayes 27, noes 78.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LANHAM. Now, Mr. Chairman, I offer my motion to strike out the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out section 1 of the committee amendment.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I have no disposition to make any argument in favor of the amendment. I have already said all I well could say against the proposed legislation, so far as the criminal features of it are concerned. I do not believe that if it were enacted into law it would protect a single hair of the head of any President of the United States now or hereafter. I believe it is unnecessary and unwise legislation, for the many reasons I have heretofore stated upon this floor.

I intend to follow up this amendment, if adopted, with a proposition to eliminate from the bill the other features kindred to this section.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas, to strike out the first section of the amendment proposed by the committee.

The question being taken, the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to see what the sentiment is upon this proposition, and I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 25.

The CHAIRMAN. On the question the ayes are 25. Does the gentleman desire the negative vote taken?

Mr. LANHAM. In view of the fact that a majority of the committee are manifestly opposed to the amendment, I withdraw the request.

The CHAIRMAN. The noes have it, and the amendment is disagreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That any person who unlawfully, purposely, and knowingly kills the Vice-President of the United States, or any officer of the United States entitled by law to succeed to the Presidency, while he is engaged in the performance of his official duties, or because of his official character, or because of any of his official acts or omissions, shall suffer death.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee rose.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment.

Mr. RAY of New York. The amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee will be pending.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee desire to offer his amendment before the vote is taken?

Mr. RAY of New York. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. If the committee rises now, will this section be subject to amendment in the morning?

The CHAIRMAN. Undoubtedly.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. I understood the Chair to recognize me for the purpose of offering the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York at the same time moved that the committee do now rise. That is a preferential motion, and if the gentleman will withhold his amendment he will be recognized in the morning.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. I will be recognized on the amendment in the morning?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GROSVENOR, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (S. 3653) and had come to no resolution thereon.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, the Military Academy appropriation bill has come over from the Senate, and I ask unanimous consent to take the bill from the Speaker's table and put it in conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the Military Academy appropriation bill, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman if the members of the minority of the committee have been consulted in respect to that motion.

Mr. HULL. No, sir; they have not.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Then I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

SEIZURE OF BRITISH SCHOONERS E. R. NICKERSON AND WARY.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and the House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report by the Secretary of State in regard to certain claims of British and German subjects growing out of the seizure of the British schooners E. R. Nickerson and Wary during the late war with Spain, which seizure was held by the prize court to be illegal and made without probable cause.

I recommend that an appropriation be made by Congress to pay the said claims in the amounts and to the persons named by the Secretary of State.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, June 6, 1902.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 11599. An act to redivide the district of Alaska into three recording and judicial divisions; and

H. R. 14380. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across Waccamaw River at Conway, in the State of South Carolina, by Conway and Seashore Railroad Company.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 259. An act to establish a light-house and fog-signal station at Semiahmoo Harbor, Gulf of Georgia, Puget Sound, State of Washington;

S. 312. An act providing that the circuit court of appeals of the eighth judicial circuit of the United States shall hold at least one term of said court annually in the city of Denver, in the State of Colorado, or in the city of Cheyenne, in the State of Wyoming, on the first Monday in September in each year, and at the city of St. Paul, in the State of Minnesota, on the first Monday in June in each year; and

S. 3800. An act to grant certain lands to the State of Idaho.

SENATE BILLS AND HOUSE BILL WITH SENATE AMENDMENTS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. 5140. An act granting an increase of pension to Dudley Cary—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 6040. An act granting an increase of pension to John W. Craine—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

H. R. 13676. An act making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes with Senate amendments—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. ELLIOTT (on request of Mr. SCARBOROUGH), indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. MCANDREWS, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. CASSINGHAM, for six days, on account of important business.

LEVI HATCHETT.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report on the bill (S. 2975) and ask that the report and statement be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The request will be complied with.

The conference report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 2975) granting an increase of pension to Levi Hatchett, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its amendment.

HENRY R. GIBSON,
A. B. DARRAGH,
RUD. KLEBERG,
Managers on the part of the House.

WM. J. DEBOE,
E. W. CARMACK,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement of the House conferees is as follows:

The Senate bill (S. 2975) increased the pension of Levi Hatchett to $24. The House amended the Senate bill by striking out "$24" and inserting "$17." The result of the conference agreement is that the House recedes, and this leaves the bill as it passed the Senate.

HENRY R. GIBSON,
RUD. KLEBERG,
Conferees on part of the House.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

And accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Quartermaster-General of the Army submitting a list of steamship lines and shipowners to whom information was furnished regarding conditions of sale of the Army transport Egbert—to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Secretary of the Interior submitting an estimate of appropriation for payment of certain deputy surveyors—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut (for Mr. HAWLEY) introduced a bill (S. 6107) granting an increase of pension to Hattie Connell; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENT TO NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PERKINS (for Mr. PENROSE) submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $300,000 for the construction of a torpedo-boat destroyer with Richard B. Painton's electrical system of multiple screw propellers and electrical rudder-steering gear apparatus, etc., intended to be proposed to the naval appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ISTHMIAN CANAL.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I wish to give notice that after the routine morning business on Wednesday next I will address the Senate on the unfinished business, being the bill (H. R. 3110) to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans.

OVERHEAD ELECTRIC WIRES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. GALLINGER. At the request of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCMILLAN], chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, I move that the joint resolution (S. R. 84) to permit the erection and use for lighting purposes of overhead electric wires outside of the fire limits, east of Rock Creek, District of Columbia, be recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is no further morning business the Calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. NELSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 1792, of which I gave notice yesterday.

Mr. DEPEW. I gave notice that I would address the Senate in a few remarks this morning, immediately after the routine morning business, on Senate bill 492, and I will now ask for that privilege.

Mr. NELSON. On what bill?

Mr. DEPEW. On the bill for the purchase of a national forest reserve in the Southern Appalachian Mountains.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Minnesota withdraw his motion?

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator from New York wants to go on, I shall not insist on my motion.

Mr. DEPEW. I do not want to be deprived of my privilege of delivering a speech, as I have to leave the city.

Mr. NELSON. My bill is one relating to the London dock clause.

Mr. DEPEW. It will take some time?

Mr. NELSON. It will take some time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York will proceed.

NATIONAL APPALACHIAN FOREST RESERVE.

Mr. DEPEW. Mr. President, Senate bill 5228, for the purchase of a national forest reserve in the Southern Appalachian Mountains, to be known as the "National Appalachian Forest Reserve," has been carefully examined and received a unanimously favorable report from the Committee on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game.

As a member of that committee, I was deeply impressed with the testimony presented. The results of the investigation were so convincing and satisfactory that legislation seemed to the committee to be imperative.

President Roosevelt in his message to the present Congress under date of December 19, 1901, says:

I heartily commend this measure to the favorable consideration of the Congress.

The Secretary of Agriculture, Hon. James Wilson, in his report to Congress of the same date, says:

The agricultural resources of the Southern Appalachian region must be protected and preserved. To that end the preservation of the forests is an indispensable condition, which will lead not to the reduction, but to the increase, of the yield of agricultural products.

The preservation of the forests, of the streams, and of the agricultural interests here described, can be successfully accomplished only by the purchase and creation of a national forest reserve.

The States of the Southern Appalachian region own little or no land, and their revenues are inadequate to carry out the plan. Federal action is obviously necessary, is fully justified by reasons of public necessity, and may be expected to have most fortunate results.

Nature has been so prodigal in her gifts of forests to the United States that the important question of their preservation has been neglected too long. The attacks of the settlers upon the woods for clearings and a home have been indiscriminate and wasteful in the extreme. The settlers are not to blame, nor are the lumbermen. The destruction which has been going on with such frightfully increasing rapidity during the last fifty years is due to a lack of that governmental supervision in the interest of the whole people which can only come from education and experience. The lumberman wishes to realize at once upon his purchase, and as a rule vast fortunes are made in deforesting the land. Railroads are run into the woods, all the appliances of modern inventions and machinery are at work, and this magnificent inheritance is being squandered with a rapidity which is full of peril for the future.

Intelligent conservation of the forests of a country is the highest evidence of its civilization. The climate, the soil, the productive capacity of the farm, the equability of the rainfall and the beneficent flow of the streams are all dependent upon the science of forestry. We have wisely set apart already in the West 41 national forest reserves—about 46,000,000 acres. One of them is already paying expenses and yielding a slight revenue.

The experience of the older countries of the world is of great value in this investigation. Forestry has been practiced in Germany for hundreds of years. Except for this wise and thoughtful care by the Government, the fatherland would be wholly unable to sustain its crowded population. Twenty-six per cent of the land of that country is in forests, of which the Government owns two-thirds. We have left in our own country only 26 per cent of our territory in woods. Germany has special schools of forestry for the education of her youth in this science. The young forester is taught all that books and lectures can give, and then is placed in a course of from three to seven years in the practical application of his work and personal study upon the ground. In that way he becomes fitted for his career. The Government not only cares for its own forests, but it brings under its supervision, laws, and rules those of private owners.

In France 17 per cent of the country is in the forest, of which the Government owns one-ninth. The ruin caused by floods and by the drying up of streams from deforesting the mountain sides led one of the ablest statesmen of France, Colbert, during the reign of Louis XIV, in 1669, to prepare and put in force a code of forest laws. Under this code, as perfected, all the forests in France, whether owned by the Government, by communes, or by individuals, are under the direct supervision and control of the department of agriculture.

The same is true in Italy, in Switzerland, and in Austria. European Governments are going still further in the line of forest preservation. The Italian Government found that their valley farms were being destroyed by the floods which in the rainy season poured down from their deforested mountain slopes. They came to the conclusion that it would be true economy for Italy to reforest these hills. They have arranged for the expenditure of $12,000,000, and this reforests only 500,000 acres. France, feeling the same disastrous effects upon her agriculture and from the same cause, expended $12,000,000 in the reforesting of 800,000 acres, and has made arrangements for the expenditure of $28,000,000 more to complete her plan. It costs for this reforesting $24 an acre in Italy and $50 an acre in France. Notwithstanding this large expenditure, it will be a half a century before the full benefit of the reforesting can be felt. It will be many generations before the soil in the woods will have acquired that quality of absorption and retention of the water which makes it both a reservoir and a protection for the farms below.

The proposition before us is not to reforest at $24 an acre, as in Italy, or at $50 an acre, as in France, but at an expense of about $2 an acre to preserve the forests which have been forming for over a thousand years in trees and soil. Scientific forestry in Germany, France, and Italy gathers an annual crop from the trees which have reached the point where they are commercially valuable and can be cut, not only without injury to, but, on the contrary, for the benefit of the whole forest, of from $1 to $5 an acre per year net, after paying all the expenses of their care.

There are many villages in Germany which pay all their taxes from the revenue derived annually from forests which they own, while other communities which sold or deforested their common lands have poor lands and are pauperized by their burdens.

Switzerland presents for our mountain regions a remarkable illustration of the necessity as well as of the benefit of forest culture. The Swiss discovered centuries ago that with the deforesting of their steep mountain sides after every rainfall the soil was washed down into the valleys and ran off in the streams and that their country was likely to become a desert. They were the pioneers in this industry of industries. As early as the beginning of 1300 they had a complete system of forest preservation and control. In the six hundred years of which they have had the records they have brought their system to such perfection that the Swiss forests not only are the salvation of Swiss agriculture, both on the hillsides and in the valleys, but they yield net to the Government $8 per acre a year. It is a form of revenue which is not subject to accidents, but can be realized upon with absolute certainty under all circumstances. Forests under such conditions are a perpetual and increasing mine of wealth to the Government on the one hand and to the whole people on the other in their influence upon farms and harvests and upon industries.

While 46,000,000 acres of land have been rescued to the West, there has been nothing done in the East. The country had a superb property, unique in every way, unequaled for richness and rarity and for the value of its product, in the redwood forests of the Pacific slope. Through carelessness simply Congress yielded to the shrewd representations of the speculator, who under that homestead plea, which is properly so attractive to the American, secured the enactment of laws by which any settler could secure 160 acres in these forests of priceless value. Then came the harvest of the lumbermen. Each of their employees staked out 160 acres. The sailors upon the vessels that carried off their lumber were induced to make claims for their 160 acres each, and the land was then transferred to the lumber companies, until, for a mere song, this magnificent inheritance of the people fell into the hands of different corporations who are mercilessly destroying the timber.

Negligence of this kind on the part of Congress becomes almost a crime. Those wonderful woods should have been preserved not for speculators and bogus settlers, but for the whole people of the country. They would, under scientific forest management, have been for all time to come not only self-supporting and revenue producing, they would have been more—they would have been the source of supplies of wood for all purposes for the inhabitants of the Pacific coast. They would have been additions to the rural scenery, which in every State and country, when attractive, helps culture and civilization. They would have been the home of game, where sportsmen could have found health and pleasure. But, instead, the land will become an arid waste, the streams will dry up, and the country will lose not only one of its best possessions, but there will be inflicted incalculable damage upon a vast region which otherwise would have remained always full of happy homes and cultivated farms.

The Appalachian forest reserve as proposed in the pending measure is about 150 miles in length and of varying breadth. It is from 400 to 600 feet above the sea. It runs through the States of Virginia, West Virginia, North and South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, and Tennessee. The slopes of these mountains are very steep, varying from 20 degrees at the lowest to 40 degrees. The waters which flow from the perpetual streams, fed by the perpetual springs, run on the one side to the Atlantic and on the other to the Gulf of Mexico. The streams from this mountain forest are the tributaries of these important rivers: The James, the Roanoke, the Catawba, the Savannah, the New (Kanawha), the Tennessee, the French Broad, the Coosa, the Yadkin, the Chattahoochee, the Broad, the Hiwassee, the Nolichucky, the Pigeon, the Tuckasegee, the Watauga, and the Holston. The region affected by these streams is from 100 to 150 miles in width on the Atlantic side, and more than that on the other. It comprises part of the richest agricultural country in the United States. The timber in this forest is all hard wood, and is the largest body of hard wood on the North American Continent. It is a museum of forest growth, embracing, on account of its location, the woods which can be grown in temperate, semitropical, and tropical countries. There are 137 varieties, making this forest one of the most interesting in the world. The deep soil has been forming for a thousand years or more, and in its interlacing of tree roots and humus, of grass and leaves, there has been created an enormous sponge for the absorption, retention, and distribution of the rainfall.

The rainfall in this region is greater than in any other part of the United States except the North Pacific coast. It ranges from 60 to 100 inches a year. The downpour at one time during the past year was 30 inches. Where the forests are intact the water finds its way through this thick and porous soil, goes into the crevices of the rocks and into the gulches and forms springs and rivulets. Nature, always beneficent in her operation, so arranges this vast collection of the rainy season that during the rest of the year it flows out naturally and equably through the rivulets into the streams and through the streams into the rivers, and waters and fertilizes half a dozen States.

The results of an attack upon this fortress, created by nature for the protection and enrichment of the people, is more disastrous than the sweep of an invading army of savages over a thickly populated and fertile country. They kill, they carry off captives, they burn and they destroy, but after the war the survivors return to their homes and in a few years every vestige of the ruin has disappeared. In its place there are again cities, villages, and happy people. But the lumberman selects a tract of hard-wood forests upon the Appalachian Mountains. The trees, young and old, big and little, surrender to the ax and the saw. Then the soil is sold to the farmer, who finds abundant harvests in its primeval richness. For about three years he gathers a remunerative and satisfactory harvest, but he sees, as the enormous rainfall descends, his farm gradually disappear. At the end of three years he can no longer plant crops, but for two years more, if lucky, he may be able to graze his stock. At the end of five years the rains and floods have washed clean the mountain sides, have left nothing but the bare rocks, have reduced his farm to a desert, and created a ruin which can never be repaired.

But this is not all. That farm has gone down with the torrents, which have been formed by the cutting off of the protecting woods, into the streams below. It has caused them to spread over the farms of the valleys and plateaus. It has turned these peaceful waters into roaring floods, which have plowed deep and destructive gullies through fertile fields and across grassy plains. One freshet in the Catawba River last spring, occasioned wholly by the deforesting of the mountains, swept away a million and a half dollars' worth of farms, buildings, and stock. The damage done by the freshet of last year alone, in the large territory fed by the streams and rivers which came from these mountains, was estimated at over $18,000,000.

This destruction can not be repeated many years without turning into a desert the fairest portion of our country. This process of destruction is constantly enlarging because of encroachments upon the forests on account of the growing scarcity of hard wood. The lumbermen are running light railways so as to reach the heretofore inaccessible depths. The giants of the mountains, which are four or five hundred years of age, and many of them 7 feet in diameter and from 140 to 150 feet high, are falling in increasing numbers every month before the pitiless and ruthless invasion of the ax and the saw. In ten years the destruction will be complete, the forests will be practically gone, the protecting soil will have been washed off the hillsides, and the newspapers will be filled each year with tales of disaster to populations, to farms, to villages, and to manufacturing enterprises, occasioned by unusual and extraordinary rains and the torrents which have been formed by them and flowed down through the valleys.

It has been estimated that there is in these mountain streams 1,000,000 horsepower which can be easily utilized. This means a saving of $30,000,000 a year in coal alone, which would otherwise have to be used for the generation of that amount of power for manufacturing purposes. But it means more. This 1,000,000 horsepower that these streams, which flow equably all the year round because of the nature of the sponge which forms the reservoir that supplies them, would create an incalculable amount of electrical power. With the successful demonstrations which have been made in California and Niagara Falls of the distance to which this energy can be transmitted, the value of these streams, kept in their original condition, to the future of these States can not be estimated. There are in these conditions all the elements necessary for transportation, for light and heat, for manufactures and mining, in a very large section of the United States.

The proposition in the bill is to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture, at an expense not exceeding $10,000,000, to purchase 4,000,000 acres of these forests. They are held now in large tracts of from 1,000 to 5,000 acres. They are being rapidly bought up by lumber companies at from $1.50 to $2 an acre. The owners, as I am informed, would much perfer selling them to the Government than to individuals or corporations. The reason is obvious. It is estimated by the Department of Agriculture that within five years the forests would be self-sustaining, and after that a source of increasing revenue for all time to come. It is impossible for the States to undertake this work. New York, in order to protect the Hudson and Mohawk, has been purchasing a large domain through the Adirondack forests which she proposes adding to every year. This is possible because the whole territory is within the limits of the State of New York. But in the Appalachian region one State can not buy the forest sources of the streams because they are in another State. The State which has the forests can not be expected to go to the expense of protecting them in order to preserve the streams and agriculture and industries of adjoining Commonwealths.

The Government does much in many ways to create wealth for the people. Every river and harbor bill carries with it millions of dollars to create wealth by dredging harbors, rivers, and streams. The irrigation propositions which are always before us and some of which have passed the Senate are also for the creation of wealth by making fertile the lands which have always lain arid. Here, however, is a proposition not for the creation of wealth, but for its preservation. This is a scheme not for many local improvements like the $70,000,000 public buildings bill or the $70,000,000 river and harbor bill, or the innumerable other bills which we pass for localities, but it is a public and beneficent measure to keep for future generations in many States and over a large area the productive energies which nature has stored for the comfort, the living, and the happiness of large populations, and for the wealth of the whole country.

It differs from all other schemes of governmental aid in another way. The advantages derived by the Government from the improvement of rivers and harbors is incidental and indirect. The same is true of irrigation, of public buildings, and public expenditures of every kind; but in this broad and beneficent scheme the Government protects its people by entering upon a business impossible for States or individuals, and which no machinery but that of the Government can carry on, and which the experience of other countries has demonstrated will prove a source of perpetual revenue.

We have been the happy possessors of such extensive forest territories that we have not yet, like other nations, felt the poverty of wood. There has not been brought home to us how dependent we are upon it for all purposes in our domestic, home, and business life. It would be little short of a national calamity if we should feel acutely the loss of our wood. That this will occur, and wood become so high as to make it a luxury, is certain if this forest denudation goes on. From the cottage of the poor man and the home and outbuildings of the farmer to the highly polished woods whose artistic graining ornaments the palaces of the rich, this wise provision of nature is our necessity. We can only keep these hard woods, which every year are becoming scarcer and more costly, within reasonable reach of the demands of the people by the Government entering upon this process of scientific forestry. Instead of this 150 miles of hard-wood forests being destroyed, as they will be in ten years unless measures are taken for their preservation, they would under this scheme last forever, and yield annually a harvest for the uses of the people. A few corporations or individuals may accumulate in a short time large fortunes by deforesting, fortunes which will disappear in a generation or two, but wise ownership, preservation, and administration by the Government will give employment, property, industries, and homes to multitudes for all time.

To sum up briefly, then, this is a work which only can be done by the Government of the United States. It should be done by the Government because it interests many States and in a large way the people of the whole country. It preserves the hard-wood forests and their product for future generations. It keeps upon the hills and mountain sides the woods whose influence upon climate, soil, and rainfall is most beneficial to a vast territory. It prevents mountain torrents, which will in time, as the destruction of the forests goes on, turn a large agricultural region into a desert. It conserves for manufacturing purposes that enormous water power which will be utilized for a multitude of industries which will give employment to thousands and add enormously to the wealth of the country. Instead of being an expense and a drain—and it would be the best expense which the Government could make if that was necessary—it will be one of those beneficent improvements which will shed blessings everywhere, and at the same time be self-sustaining and a source of everlasting revenue to the Government.

Mr. NELSON rose.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, before the Senate proceeds to consider any other matter, I wish the Senator from New York would tell us, after we have had the positive delight of listening to the rhythmic flow of his eloquence, what is the practical plan he has in view to accomplish the very great object upon which he has spoken.

Mr. DEPEW. I am very much obliged to my friend the Senator from Maine for asking that question.

There is a bill brought in by the Committee on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game, unanimously reported after an exhaustive consideration, which provides the plan for the accomplishment of this result. It proposes to give to the Secretary of Agriculture the right to purchase a reservation upon the Southern Appalachian Mountains, and appropriates $10,000,000 for that purpose, to be used as the scheme is perfected and the purchases are made.

The testimony before the committee was that these forests now lie in one body; that the invasion upon them so far by farmers and settlers has been very slight; that they are all in the market for sale, and that without any doubt the whole of the 4,000,000 acres can be purchased for $10,000,000.

Mr. HALE. Making a great public governmental reservation.

Mr. DEPEW. It makes a great public governmental reservation, the same kind as the 41 forest reservations that we already have in the new States.

Mr. HALE. I do not think that anyone listening to the Senator can fail to have been impressed with the very great importance of this subject as he has presented it. Business is so diversified here, and as pretty much every one of us is devoting his time and attention to special purposes and objects, I was not aware of the extent of the scheme proposed by the bill. Something ought to be done about it at the present session. The very thing that is going on, the ravage of this region, which will, as the Senator says, make it a desert in ten years, ought to be arrested, and at no distant day.

I hope if the Senator is not here other Senators upon the committee will see to it that the bill which he has explained to us is brought before the Senate and that the Senate will properly appreciate the purpose and the work, so that we may embark on this most important enterprise of the Government to save that great forest region.

Mr. PRITCHARD. Mr. President, I had intended to ask for a vote on the measure at this time, but owing to the absence of my colleague [Mr. SIMMONS], who desires to submit some remarks in respect to the measure, I give notice that I shall call it up some time next week, in order that we may have a vote upon the question.

Mr. HALE. I hope the Senator will do that.

Mr. PRITCHARD. The matter has been thoroughly investigated by the Agricultural Department and the bill has the favorable recommendation of that Department, as well as of the President of the United States.

LONDON DOCK CHARGES.

Mr. NELSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 1792) to amend an act entitled "An act relating to navigation of vessels, bills of lading, and to certain obligations, duties, and rights in connection with the carriage of property," and I ask unanimous consent that it may be considered without the limitation of debate imposed by the eighth rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Minnesota.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the limitation on debate under rule 8 may be dispensed with during the consideration of this bill. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The bill will be read.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with; and before taking up the bill and reading it for amendment, I desire to make a brief statement in explanation of the merits of the measure.

Mr. HALE. Before the Senator from Minnesota goes on, I wish to inquire whether an amendment to his bill, which was proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], has been offered or only notice of it was given?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The memory of the Chair is that it was printed and laid on the table, and it will be necessary to offer it as an amendment.

Mr. HALE. I shall see to it, then, in the absence of the Senator from Massachusetts, that the amendment is offered. I did not know but that it was already pending.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I desire briefly to explain the merits of the bill.

The object of the proposed bill is to relieve the shippers of American products in this country from certain burdens and charges imposed by a combination of steamship companies plying in the North Atlantic trade in respect to the products shipped to the port of London.

Before I go into a discussion of the case, in order that the Senate may understand some of the quotations, I desire to state that at the close of the last session the millers of Minneapolis called my attention to the evils complained of, the injustice imposed upon American shippers by the steamship companies in forcing them to accept bills of lading incorporating what is known as the London clause, a clause charging them a certain specific amount for the discharging of their goods at the port of London.

The millers called my attention, as I said, to that subject at the close of the last session. It was too late then to take it up. I afterwards, in order to obtain full information in the premises, referred the matter to the State Department, with the request that the Department get our minister in England to investigate the whole subject. The Department referred it to our minister, Mr. Choate, who made a careful and thorough investigation and submitted an extensive report both upon the law and the facts to Congress.

Prior to 1893 the shipping companies plying in the north Atlantic trade had been in the habit of incorporating clauses into their bills of lading exempting them from all liability for the negligence of their servants and masters in stowing and conveying the cargo; in fact, exonerating them from all liability, no matter in what shape they stowed the cargo, no matter in what shape they carried it, and no matter in what shape they delivered it. The evil became so great that finally the American shippers, in 1893, applied to Congress for relief, and there was passed what is commonly known as the Harter Act.

The first section of that act provides:

> That it shall not be lawful for the manager, agent, master, or owner of any vessel transporting merchandise or property from or between ports of the United States and foreign ports to insert in any bill of lading or shipping document any clause, covenant, or agreement whereby it, he, or they shall be relieved from liability for loss or damage arising from negligence, fault, or failure in proper loading, stowage, custody, care, or proper delivery of any and all lawful merchandise or property committed to its or their charge. Any and all words or clauses of such import inserted in bills of lading or shipping receipts shall be null and void and of no effect.

Section 2 is on the same lines, and I shall not take up the time of the Senate to read it.

The evils then complained of were remedied by this act. Up to that time the steamship companies had been in the habit of forcing upon American shippers bills of lading with clauses that exonerated them from liability, and this law was intended to relieve them from that onus and to prohibit the insertion of any such clauses.

Since that time the steamship companies having vessels plying in the North Atlantic trade, between our country and the port of London, have formed a combination and compelled American shippers to accept bills of lading incorporating what is known as the London clause. The London clause is a clause compelling shippers to pay, in addition to the ordinary and usual freight charges, a certain specific sum for the unloading and delivery of the cargo in the port of London. Under the law and custom prevailing in the port of London all goods are entitled to free delivery.

In order that Senators may fully understand the question, I will say that the river Thames is a great big tide-water stream which flows through the heart of the city of London, and over 76 per cent of the goods that are delivered from the steamship companies on the docks are again put back from the docks into lighters and barges that ply on the river and are distributed to the various localities along the wharves by those lighters, so as to be delivered throughout the city.

By the custom of the port of London, by the common law of the port, and also by the act of Parliament, the consignees of goods are entitled to free delivery of the goods overside in the port of London, delivered on board barges and lighters direct overside from the vessel.

I will read you a few sentences from Minister Choate's report, showing you what the law is and what the act of Parliament is governing the port of London. This is the history of the matter:

> Prior to the formation of docks in London, about a century ago, the usual mode of discharging cargo was overside into barges or lighters in midstream, the barges carrying it to the wharves and quays.
> The formation of docks was stoutly opposed by the powerful association of bargemen or watermen, and to save their rights and the powerful interest represented by their business, which was of great antiquity, a clause was inserted in the original and in each succeeding dock charter in substance exempting all lighters and craft entering the docks to discharge or receive goods to or from any vessel from the payment of any rates, and that the goods so discharged or received should be exempt from any payment whatever, and so the law now stands. This secured to the bargemen and to the owners of cargo the ancient right to the loading and discharge of cargo overside, even in the docks, without any charge by the dock companies.

In other words, before the docks were established the consignees of goods were entitled to the free delivery of their goods overside the ship directly into lighters. When the dock companies were incorporated, that right was still reserved; that right was still retained; the consignees were still entitled to the free delivery of goods even if the goods were placed on the dock and from the dock put back into lighters.

In 1894—to make the question still clearer and to settle it—an act of Parliament was passed. I will read one provision of the act bearing on this matter, and ask the attention of the Senate to it:

> (4) If any goods are, for the purpose of convenience in assorting the same, landed at the wharf where the ship is discharged, and the owner of the goods at the time of that landing has made entry and is ready and offers to take delivery thereof, and to convey the same to some other wharf or warehouse, the goods shall be assorted at landing, and shall, if demanded, be delivered to the owner thereof within twenty-four hours after assortment, and the expense of and consequent upon that landing and assortment shall be borne by the shipowner.

That is the law to-day in the port of London; that is, the consignees of goods are entitled to free delivery overside from the ship into barges and lighters. But if the shipowners, for their convenience in assorting their cargo and distributing it, see fit to take it first out of the ships onto the dock, the consignees are still entitled to the delivery of those goods from the dock into lighters or barges free of charge.

It is a curious thing about the port of London, different from any other port that I know of, that over 76 per cent—and this report and the statistics show it to be over 76 per cent—of all the goods that are discharged from steamers to the docks and wharves are simply discharged for the purpose of assorting, and are put back into the barges and lighters for distribution and delivery throughout the city.

The steamship companies, for their own convenience in discharging a cargo, especially in the case of mixed cargoes, can assort them better and more easily by having dock space on the quay for this purpose and to get access to the ships with the goods to be sent abroad, they require dock space for their own convenience. They have seen fit, instead of distributing and delivering the goods directly overside into lighters and barges, to place them on the dock and then from the dock back again into the barges and lighters. Over 76 per cent of the goods are thus placed on the dock for delivery to lighters. All this charge was borne by the shipowners up to 1888. At that time the steamship companies began to insert in their bills of lading from this country to the port of London what was known as the London dock clause.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I ask the Senator if he knows whether the same rule prevails with reference to the commerce from other countries.

Mr. NELSON. I am coming to that later on. The only products that enter the port of London to-day in steamships that have to bear the burden of the London clause are goods in ships from North America; and I shall show from Mr. Choate's report that that is the fact.

Mr. HALE. The Senator does not claim that as to other countries from which shipments are made by transportation companies, in no case is the London dock clause resorted to?

Mr. NELSON. That is what I claim, as the evidence and the report of Mr. Choate show.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. It is impossible to hear on this side of the Chamber what is going on, owing to the low voice in which Senators are speaking.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Do I understand that this is a discrimination against the United States?

Mr. NELSON. This is a discrimination against the United States, and I shall prove it by the report. I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the only case in which it is applied is in what are known as American bills of lading. The steamship companies having vessels plying in the North Atlantic trade between our ports and the port of London have inserted this London clause, and it is not found in the case of any other transportation companies, and ours are the only products subject to that charge in the port of London.

Mr. HALE. I think the Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator will allow me, I will call the attention of Senators to page 9 of the report:

> These charges of the "London clause" are a pure discrimination against the American trade, and do not apply to any other trade in the port of London.

That is the language used by me in the report. Now, I read a quotation from what appears in the hearings before the committee:

> This charge of 1s. 6d. to 2s. 6d. is one which penalizes American goods, as it is not applied in the port of London to goods arriving from any other market; in other words, flour from Russia, the Cape, Australia, or in fact any other market except North America, does not pay this charge, and to that extent American goods of all descriptions (for flour is only one of these) are penalized by this charge. (Hearings, p. 87.)

I will now read from Mr. Choate's report. He says:

> There is undoubtedly a discrimination as against flour from the United States and Canada in favor of flour coming to London from all other parts of the world. Flour is brought to London from many other parts of the world, and is landed and delivered from large steamers in much the same way, and whatever cost attaches to this mode of delivery is paid by the shipowners out of the freight, no such clause as the "London clause" having been adopted. (Choate, p. 7.)

I read further from Mr. Choate:

> Canadian and American flour is by far the largest import of flour into London, and although other imported flour, such as Hungarian, French, Russian, Australian, Californian, gets free overside delivery, Canadian and American flour is subjected to the "London clause," and besides which, whereas the charge for landing at an uptown warehouse for the purpose of distribution in Canadian and American is 4s. per ton, the charge on other imported flour is 3s. 6d. per ton, so that Canadian and American costs 2s. per ton more to land than other flour. (Choate, p. 33.)

When this London dock clause was first inserted in their bills of lading, for the first two years the steamship companies hired the dock companies to do the discharging of the cargo; and at that time—I will give you as an example one commodity, that of flour—at that time the steamship companies paid the dock companies 10d., equal to 20 cents in our money, for discharging flour—that is, discharging it from the vessel onto the dock and from the dock back on the barges and lighters. In 1891 the steamship companies took that labor away from the dock companies, and instead of hiring the dock companies to do it they did it themselves, and immediately they advanced the rates. For instance, upon flour they advanced the rate from 10d. a ton to 1s. 2d. a ton, an increase of 4d., or 8 cents, a ton. There is a good deal of profit in these dock charges. The representatives of the steamship companies appearing before our committee denied that, but the facts are against them. I will read this brief statement from the report:

> Although the shipowners, through their representatives, at the hearing denied, but not under oath, that there was any profit to them in these charges, there is a preponderance of evidence the other way, showing that there is quite a margin of profit. From 1888, when the "London clause" was first adopted, until 1891, the cargoes were discharged by the dock companies, who, in the case of flour, for instance, only charged the shipowners 10 pence per ton for the service, for which the shipowners now charge 1 shilling 9 pence per ton.

That is what was charged. They started out when they first undertook the work at 10 pence per ton, and they advanced it to 1 shilling 9 pence per ton.

> In the next place the testimony, under oath, of Mr. Scott, chairman of the dock company, which performed the work for the shipowners for two years under the "London clause," is clear and positive on this point:
> "This profit is supposed to be considerable, and is, of course, a fixed quantity unaffected by the fluctuation of freight. We may mention that the supposition that there is a considerable profit hanging to the charges made for the work done under the 'London clause' was recently confirmed by Mr. Charles J. C. Scott, the chairman of the London and India Docks Company, the company who actually performed this work for the shipowners during the first two years of the 'London clause,' and who should be an indisputable authority.
> "When giving evidence before the royal commission on the port of London, on May 6, 1901, Mr. Scott says, in reply to Sir John Wolfe Barry:
> "Q. 5657. Under the conditions of the North American trade, the shipowner has done his work when he puts the cargo on the quay?
> "A. Yes; but the shipowner, under the North American bill of lading, by his bill of lading is entitled to make a charge for doing that, and there is a considerable amount of profit hanging onto that, so that the shipowner is anxious to put it on the quay.
> "(Choate, p. 16, and Hearings, p. 69.)"

The original London dock clause was a very small and brief one. The charge was quite limited when it was adopted, in 1888, but from time to time they have advanced it, until now they have a multitude of conditions. It started with a little paragraph of a dozen lines, and now they have got a paragraph of several hundred lines, incorporating all manner of conditions. They even charge for commodities in cases where the delivery is just the same as under the old system. Take wheat, or oats, or corn, or barley, or other coarse grain which is shipped in bulk, which is not delivered on the dock at all, but is delivered directly from the ship into the lighter—even on those products in this London dock clause they have incorporated a charge in addition of 1s. 9d. They charge on wheat an additional 7d., making it fully 2s. 4d. for discharging it overside from the ship into the lighter or barge.

One of the arguments advanced by the shipowners was that it was for the convenience of the consignee to have the goods delivered at the dock, and from the dock back into the lighter. That is not true. The evidence presented to the committee, which appears in the hearings—and if necessary I will call the attention of Senators to it—shows that it is for the convenience of the steamship companies rather than that of the consignees or shippers, and I will explain why. Under the old system, where they had direct delivery from the ship overside into the lighter or the barge, as soon as the lighter or barge was filled it could go away and deliver the goods; but under the present system the ship discharges the cargo on the dock; it remains there to be assorted and delivered back onto the ship, and from the ship onto the lighter or barge; but before that can be done, oftentimes when a ship has been there and discharged, as soon as it gets through and before the barge or lighter can come up and take the goods away, another ship is alongside the dock; and so it comes to pass that under the present system oftentimes the barges are delayed from day to day before they can approach the dock and get the goods to take away and deliver them.

This London dock clause charge is in addition to the dock charges imposed by the dock company. If goods after landing on the dock are left to be distributed from the dock by carts or land carriages, then the dock company imposes a charge in addition of from 3 shillings and 6 pence a ton to 5 shillings per ton; but if the goods are delivered back from the wharves into the barges and lighters the consignee is not obliged to pay this charge. Under the London clause as it exists to-day if a cargo of flour is shipped from New York to the port of London when it enters that port under the London clause it has to pay 1 shilling and 9 pence to the steamship companies for discharging the cargo from the vessel; and if the flour is left on the dock to be carried away by cart or distributed by land conveyance in any shape they have to pay in addition a dock charge of, I think, 3 shillings and 6 pence or 4 shillings per ton. This is denied by the representatives of the company, but we had positive evidence on that point, and I beg leave to read it to the Senate—a letter addressed to me by Mr. Bradley. It is as follows:

> Hon. KNUTE NELSON,
> United States Senate, Washington, D. C.
> DEAR SIR: You will remember that I made a statement in the committee that the London landing charge applied on all flour going into the port of London, whether it was delivered directly to the buyer or went on storage on the docks. You will also remember that the steamship company contradicted this, stating that when flour went on storage charges that the 1 shilling 9 pence was refunded. For your information I now inclose a certificate of a notary public of New York City confirming my statement, this gentleman having made an official examination of the tariffs. You will therefore see that this bears out my statement in full detail.

Yours, very truly,

H. BRADLEY.

STATE OF NEW YORK, County of New York, ss:

I, Frederic H. Cohoon, of New York, hereby certify that I have examined an official copy of the tariff sheet issued by the London and India Docks Company, dated at Dock House, 109 Leadenhall street, London, E. C., March 1, 1901, which contains a list of all the quay rates and storage charges, etc., and such examination contains absolute evidence that all flour landed in London, whether it goes on storage charges or is delivered directly to the importers, is subject to a landing charge as contained in the bills of lading, and that the said list of rates at the commencement of same contained the following clause:

"The following rates are exclusive of the charge payable by the consignees under the London clauses in the American bills of lading, but include insurance against fire in accordance with the policies of the fire insurance offices."

I am further advised that the above clause, including charges as previously made, was approved and unaltered January 1, 1902.

Witness my hand this 5th day of April, 1902.

[SEAL.] F. H. COHOON,

Notary Public, New York County, N. Y.

So I want Senators to bear in mind that this charge incorporated into bills of lading, known as the London dock clause, is simply to pay the steamship companies for discharging a cargo. Under the common law and under the act of Parliament it is their duty to discharge that cargo overside free into barges and lighters; but for their own convenience they see fit to discharge it first onto the dock and then place it back in barges and lighters, and for that service they impose a charge, which they have no right to make, upon all American shippers or the consignees of goods, and that charge is in addition, supplementary to, and outside of the charges of the dock company.

There is no dispute but what the American shippers are utterly helpless, for when they deliver their flour, for instance, at Minneapolis—and the same applies to any American product—lumber, wheat, or anything else—when it is delivered to a railroad company for shipment abroad, the railroad company, knowing that the steamship companies insist upon these charges, will not accept the goods except subject to bill of lading demanded by the steamship companies, and that the steamship companies engaged in the North Atlantic trade have formed a combination and are all one in this matter is not at all disputed.

I have before me a copy of the hearings in which is found their last announcement, made in January, 1891, when they made the last raise in their dock charges. They have raised them two or three times; but the last time they raised them they signed a notice, and here is a list of nine or ten steamship companies—I will not take up the time of the Senate to read it—notifying the shippers that they would increase the charges in the London dock clause to that extent. It is not disputed; it was not disputed at the hearings that the steamship companies had combined and had insisted on inserting that clause in the bills of lading.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I should like to ask the Senator on what theory these charges are made. As I understand the Senator, they are made exclusively against American goods.

Mr. NELSON. I can not tell the Senator, except that the steamship companies have combined among themselves to get this extra charge. The general rule of maritime law is that the freight charges which are paid for carrying a cargo include the discharge of that cargo; but, in addition to the freight charges, these steamship companies exact this extra charge, and they claim that it is done because they deliver the goods on the dock instead of delivering them directly overside into the lighter or the barge.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I understand this charge is made only against Americans?

Mr. NELSON. It is only made against goods transported in vessels engaged in the North Atlantic trade, American and Canadian.

Mr. HALE. I have already said that that is not the case, although the Senator believes that it is. I do not. There are other great lines from other parts of the globe that have a clause almost exactly like this, covering the same points. There is no discrimination as to our own goods being covered by the clause. Every Canadian ship has got to pay just the same, and it has always been so.

Mr. NELSON. I have already stated that, Mr. President. If I have not, I certainly intended to do so. This includes Canadian products and the products of our country. It includes goods shipped from this side of North America, including the United States and Canada, into the port of London. It relates wholly to London, and it is called the London dock clause.

Mr. HALE. The Senator is wrong about that.

Mr. NELSON. I am not wrong.

Mr. HALE. It relates to Glasgow, to Manchester, to Liverpool, and other ports. The great Oriental and Peninsular Navigation Company, with its lines of ships traversing almost all the waters of the globe, has provisions of this kind and always has had. It is for the convenience of trade. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator; but I will state my position after he is through. I only wanted at this time to call attention to this one point.

Mr. NELSON. If you will read page 6 of the report of the Committee on Commerce, you will find that it is spoken of in the circular of the North Atlantic shipowners as the London clause.

Mr. HALE. It is called the London clause undoubtedly.

Mr. NELSON. It is the London clause; and there is no such clause in any other bill of lading from any other country. The testimony taken at the hearings and the report of Mr. Choate show that no other goods or products, except those from the United States and Canada, are subject to this charge.

American shippers are utterly helpless against this combination. What can they do? The railroads refuse to receive goods unless the shipper will agree to submit to the bill of lading from the steamship companies incorporating the London clause. The steamship companies are unwilling to issue a bill of lading unless that clause is incorporated.

The trouble is that if that clause were not incorporated in the bill of lading, they could not make such a charge in England. The courts of that country have decided in cases that have been brought there that under the common law and under the act of Parliament London is a free port, and shippers are entitled to free delivery of their goods overside to barges and lighters from the ships; and under the act of Parliament of 1894 are entitled to free delivery into the barges; but the English court holds that because the American shipper has accepted a bill of lading containing that London dock clause, he has contracted himself, as it were, outside of the purview of the common law and outside of the purview of the act of Parliament. If that clause was not forced upon American shippers and inserted in the bills of lading, the steamship companies would not be entitled to collect a penny of that kind of charge in the port of London.

Mr. HALE. Who signs those bills of lading?

Mr. NELSON. The bills of lading are issued by the steamship companies.

Mr. HALE. But who signs them?

Mr. NELSON. They are signed by the steamship companies and issued to the shippers.

Mr. HALE. Issued to the shippers?

Mr. NELSON. They are issued to the shippers.

Mr. HALE. It is by contract.

Mr. SCOTT. But the shippers are obliged to make that contract or the companies would not take their goods.

Mr. HALE. Here we are attempting to say that men shall not make such contracts. Those are the terms of the bill, as Senators will see if they will read it. What I am afraid of is that Senators will not examine this question as they ought to. It is an attempt to declare, in a fight between the millers and steamship companies, that men shall not be held by contracts which they have made. I have never before known that to be done or attempted to be done.

Mr. NELSON. I will convince the Senator on that point if he will listen to me.

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator from Minnesota yield to me a moment?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. BERRY. I want to say, in answer to the Senator from Maine, that the English law specifies the charges in English ports. The shipowners compel the exporters here to enter into a contract whereby they are to pay more than the law of England would require them to pay but for that agreement. The shipowners have a combination. All the shipowners agree to this, and they will take no man's product for shipment unless he does sign it.

The Senator from Maine says it is a contract. It is a contract which is forced upon the exporter, and one which he has no power to resist. It is a contract made by one side, compelling the shipper to pay more than the shipowners compel the people of any other port than North Atlantic ports to pay. Our producers can not compete with shipments from Australia and various other countries because those shippers do not pay it. This contract is peculiar to the North Atlantic ports. The Senator says it is a contract. It is a contract where there is only one party to the contract, because the shipowners force the shippers to make it, and they can not ship their goods unless they do it.

Mr. HALE. By leave of the Senator from Minnesota, I wish to ask the Senator from Arkansas a question. It is rather our fashion here to have colloquial debate.

Mr. NELSON. I yield.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I hope the Senator from Maine will speak so that we on this side may hear him.

Mr. HALE. I will. I wish to ask the Senator from Arkansas just what he means when he says that because of this practice the millers, who got up this bill, for it is a millers' bill——

Mr. BERRY. The Senator from Maine is mistaken about that.

Mr. HALE. The Senator says our millers can not compete with the rest of the world, when everybody knows there practically is no competition in the London trade for flour. Ten or twelve years ago we exported ten thousand million hundredweight, and under these immense grievances which Senators are depicting our exports have increased in the last ten years to seventeen thousand million hundredweight, whereas the supply from the rest of the world is but a hundred and seventy-two thousand hundredweight. The American millers are not only able to compete, but they have destroyed the trade of the rest of the world. They have not suffered and are not kept down by this practice, but are getting more and more to supply to the London market its entire import of flour.

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator permit me to answer?

Mr. HALE. Yes; I want the Senator to answer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. BERRY. In the first place, the statement of the Senator from Maine that the millers and flourmen are the only people interested is a mistake.

Mr. HALE. And the lumbermen.

Mr. BERRY. The lumbermen are largely interested in it.

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. BERRY. Because the charge on lumber——

Mr. NELSON. Is even higher.

Mr. BERRY. Is higher even than on flour.

The Senator from Maine is also mistaken in another proposition. There is competion from the South American Republics in regard to the shipment of flour and wheat from those countries, and they do not pay these charges. Shipments from the South American Republics and Mexico go in free of this London dock charge, or this London clause, which is put in against the shippers from the North Atlantic ports.

Mr. HALE rose.

Mr. BERRY. If the Senator will permit me, why should not the steamship companies put into their freight bill whatever charges they demand for carrying freight? Why insert this particular clause to make these parties pay it?

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

Mr. BERRY. I will tell the Senator why, in one moment, if he will permit me. The court in London, as our minister, Mr. Choate, reported when the shippers appealed to the courts in England alleging that the steamship lines were charging more than the laws of England authorized, said: "That is true; they are charging you more; they are forcing you to pay more, and the court would not permit it but for the fact that you have made a contract by which you are to pay more, and this court has not the power to give you relief."

Mr. HALE. Let me ask the Senator a question. He says, Why do not the steamship companies put it into the freight? He struck there which is a very underlying criticism of this bill. If the charge of what they now complain was put into the freight charges, who would pay it?

Mr. BERRY. The shipper would pay it.

Mr. HALE. Of course he would pay it. He would pay it simply in another form.

Mr. BERRY. Yes.

Mr. HALE. And yet the advocates of this bill all the time, seeing that they will be pushed to the wall and have finally got to agree to keep their contracts, are compelled to state, as the Senator has, that if this charge were put into the freight there would be no objection and then the exporter would pay every part of it.

Mr. BERRY. I will answer the Senator. If the steamships thought they would get the same amount by putting it into the freight, they would not be fighting this bill and having men before the committee and around these corridors to oppose it. If they put it in the freight bill, they know that competition will force them to pay these charges themselves, which they now force the shipper to pay. That is the reason why the lumbermen and the flourmen are interested in it. Let the companies put it into the freight bill. You say they can add it to the freight charges. Why this opposition to the bill if the companies would get it the same way—get it from the shipper? The shippers are willing to take their chances on that. The steamship companies know full well that when they are forced to do that the outside opposition will force them to pay the charges and the shippers will not have to.

I ask pardon of the Senator from Minnesota for having occupied so much of his time.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator from Minnesota permit me to say a word?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. One observation was made by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY] which I think ought not to go precisely as it was stated, and that is that there are men around the Capitol, and I think he said they were before the committee, opposing this bill. As a member of the Committee on Commerce I agreed that the bill should be reported, but I want to say that I never saw anybody before the committee opposing it, and no man outside of the committee has ever called it to my attention except one person, and he came promptly within a few days and said he had no objection to it. I think the Senator ought not to draw upon his imagination in reference to men being here lobbying.

Mr. BERRY. I never said anything about men being here lobbying. The Senator from New Hampshire was absent, I presume, when the committee hearings were had. He says he saw nobody before the committee in opposition to the bill. We had hearings and arguments on two or three different days. There was an attorney from South Carolina, and there were two or three from New York. There were attorneys on both sides. There were present a number of men, as the Senator from Minnesota well knows—in fact, the committee room was crowded with them. We had arguments for several days from attorneys representing both sides. I did not use the word "lobbyists." I said that the men who owned ships would not have men here to oppose the bill so strongly if they could, as the Senator from Maine suggested, by putting this charge in the freight bill get the money in the same way. That is all I intended to say and all I did say.

Mr. GALLINGER. I stand corrected in reference to the hearings before the committee, as I was absent on two occasions, to my regret.

Mr. BERRY. I thought so.

Mr. GALLINGER. But certainly, so far as any outside influence is concerned, I am sure none has been exerted on members of the committee.

Mr. BERRY. I never said that.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think it is a business proposition. I am somewhat undecided as to whether or not it is wise legislation, but I feel sure it is something that we can dispose of and decide upon the merits of the case.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. MCCUMBER. The Senator from Minnesota has been so generous in allowing questions that I should like a little further information, and because he is so thoroughly acquainted with the subject I will ask him, before he gets through with the subject, to answer this simple proposition: Suppose, now, the object of the bill being to eliminate from bills of lading the London clause, that the proposed act becomes a law. We succeed in eliminating it. What guaranty have we or what reason have we to expect that the same companies will not combine and increase the amount of the freight to an equivalent of the loss by reason of eliminating this particular clause?

Mr. NELSON. I will say to the Senator in one sense we have no absolute guaranty, but I call his attention to the fact that ocean freights are subject to competition and fluctuation, according to the amount to be carried. When ships come here and are anxious to get cargo and cargo is scarce, rates are low. When cargo is abundant or overabundant, rates are high. But the freight rate is always subject to fluctuation and competition, and if there is any reduction or change in that matter the shipper gets the benefit of it, whereas this charge in the bill of lading, caused by the London clause, is a fixed and arbitrary charge, and is not subject to any competition, and the companies get it under all circumstances.

Mr. MCCUMBER. But why may we not expect the same competition in eliminating this clause that exists in regard to freight rates?

Mr. NELSON. How can there be competition in a clause they insert? I will put a case. The Senator is anxious to ship a lot of flour from Wahpeton, N. Dak., his home, to London. He can not ship unless he will accept a bill of lading agreeing to pay, in addition to the freight, 1 shilling 9 pence for discharging his flour in the port of London. There is no competition about that charge.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I understand the proposition, and I want to say to the Senator that I am wholly in sympathy with his bill and what he desires to obtain by it. But what I can not understand is why there would not be the same competition in the rate with this clause that there would be without it. In other words, suppose——

Mr. NELSON. But there is no competition as to this particular charge.

Mr. MCCUMBER. No.

Mr. NELSON. The Senator understands that. This charge is a fixed and arbitrary charge, put into the bill of lading no matter what the freight rate may be. But if the steamship companies are unable to insert this extra charge in the bill of lading and have to cover it all under freight, freight is the subject of competition and a matter of fluctuation and change, of which the shipper gets the benefit.

Mr. McCUMBER. But, applying the rule of competition to this particular case, suppose, now, that there are more vessels ready to carry grain from the port of Duluth, or any other port in the United States, to London than there is grain to be carried. Why would there not be the same competition in the matter, so that one shipowner might say, "I will be willing to take your freight and will not insist upon this clause, if you will ship by my vessel?"

Mr. NELSON. The shipowners have all combined on the London clause.

Mr. McCUMBER. I understand; but why will they not combine just the same with respect to the freight?

Mr. NELSON. That is something with which we will take our chances. There is no guaranty for that. We are absolutely at the mercy of the new shipping trust formed by Mr. Morgan, whereby he seems to have gotten control of everything. We are trying here, I want to say to the Senator from North Dakota, and the Senate has passed such a bill and it is pending in the House, to give aid to American ships and American shipping, and now when we have here a measure to protect the American shipper and the American producer against the shipping trust, then we are met with opposition in this Chamber. I am willing to do what is reasonable to help to promote American shipping, but it does pain me exceedingly to see the shipping combination—I refer to nobody in this Chamber—come here, and that, when the producers of this country and the shippers of flour and wheat and lumber and of all American products come and ask for this relief and to be put on a par with all other shippers and producers in the port of London, they are met with opposition.

Mr. HALE. Has the Senator heard from the shippers of wheat and corn, aside from flour shippers?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly I have; and you are hearing from one now. I am a producer of wheat. I am personally interested in this measure, and it is the only bill pending in Congress in which I have a personal interest, to a small extent, as a raiser of agricultural products.

Mr. HALE. I do not understand that the shippers of wheat and corn, aside from shippers of flour—the millers—are interested. It is the millers and the lumbermen who are at the bottom of this bill.

Mr. NELSON. The Senator is utterly mistaken. There are papers on file from the beef producers, the shippers of American meat products, in Chicago and other ports. They are affected in the same way.

Mr. HALE. That is, the beef trust?

Mr. NELSON. God deliver us from trusts; but the shipping trust is about as bad as any trust I know of.

Now, I am coming to another question. The Senator from Maine suggested it, and then we went off into a side issue on other matters. He inquired about the bill of lading, and why, if the shippers accepted the bill of lading, they should not be bound by it. There are a great many instances where parties are forced to accept bills of lading and contracts that are against public policy and unjust, and the courts will not uphold them.

I call attention to what the Supreme Court of the United States has said in a case in 17 Wallace. That was a case where a railroad company had forced a passenger to accept a certain pass, exonerating it from all liability for the negligence of its agents. It was the case of a man who shipped cattle, I think to Chicago or some other market, and it is customary in those cases, where a man ships a carload or two of cattle, to give him a pass to go with the cattle and to come back, as a part of the contract. The railroad company had incorporated in the pass, or in the ticket they issued, a clause exonerating it from all liability for negligence. Here is what the Supreme Court says in the matter:

> The carrier and his customer do not stand on a footing of equality. The latter is only one individual of a million. He can not afford to higgle or stand out and seek redress in the courts. He prefers, rather, to accept any bill of lading or sign any paper the carrier presents; often, indeed, without knowing what the one or the other contains. In most cases he has no alternative but to do this or abandon his business. If the customer had any real freedom of choice—

We have not. There is a combination. There is not a freedom of choice—

> * * * If the customer had any real freedom of choice; if he had a reasonable and practicable alternative, and the employment of the carrier were not a public one, charging him with the duty of accommodating the public in the line of his employment—then, if the customer assumes the risk of negligence, it could with more reason be said to be his private affair and no concern of the public. But the condition of things is entirely different, and especially so under the modified arrangements which the carrying trade has assumed.
> The business is mostly concentrated in a few powerful corporations, whose position in the body politic enables them to control it. They do, in fact, control it and impose such conditions upon travel and transportation as they see fit, which the public is compelled to accept. These circumstances furnish an additional argument, if it were needed, to show that the conditions imposed by common carriers ought not to be averse, to say the least, to the dictates of public policy and morality.

I will not read it all.

Mr. McCUMBER. May I ask the Senator from Minnesota a question? I do not understand that his bill is retrospective at all.

Mr. NELSON. Not at all.

Mr. McCUMBER. It does not affect any contract heretofore made?

Mr. NELSON. No.

Mr. McCUMBER. It simply prohibits them in the future.

Mr. NELSON. I call attention to another statement from the Supreme Court in the case of United States v. Joint Traffic Association (171 U. S.):

> Notwithstanding the general liberty of contract which is possessed by the citizen under the Constitution, we find that there are many kinds of contracts which, while not in themselves immoral or mala in se, may yet be prohibited by the legislation of the States or in certain cases by Congress. The question comes back whether the statute under review is a legitimate exercise of the power of Congress over the interstate commerce and a valid regulation thereof.

I might read more authorities on this subject. In this connection I will call the Senator's attention to a case upon which our Supreme Court has lately passed. It is known as the case of the Kensington. It is the case of an American lady and her friend who purchased a ticket in Belgium over the International Navigation Company's line to New York. The ticket contained a clause exempting the company from all liability for damage to baggage over and beyond 250 francs, or $50 in our money, unless the passenger would have the baggage billed as freight, subject to the conditions of nonliability such as they were in the habit of incorporating into their bills of lading. Our Supreme Court in the case of the Kensington recently decided that, nothwithstanding such exemption from liability was valid and good from the port of departure, it was against our public policy and would not be upheld in the courts of the United States.

Mr. President, to sum up, under the common law, the custom of the port, and the act of Parliament, American shippers are entitled to free delivery of their goods in the port of London. They are exempt from this charge caused by the London dock clause, inserted in the bill of lading. The courts of London have held that nothwithstanding that is the law, the shipper having accepted a bill of lading, it is a contract, and therefore, under the law which prevails in England, it does away with the effect of the custom of the port of London as defined by the common law and the act of Parliament, and the shipper has to pay the charge.

Under the decisions of our court Congress is supreme. It has control over interstate commerce, as decided by the Supreme Court of the United States. And we have a right to do here as we did when the Harter Act was passed in 1893, to forbid their inserting in their bill of lading a clause contrary to the conditions and the laws and the customs prevailing in the port of London.

The American shipper is entirely helpless, because the steamship companies plying in the North Atlantic trade have united and combined and refuse to accept a cargo or deliver a bill of lading without the London clause. The shipper has to accept it or nothing; and all we ask to-day, Mr. President, is legislation on the part of Congress prohibiting them from inserting the London clause in every bill of lading. We want them to leave American products and American shippers in the port of London in exactly the same condition that shippers and products from other countries are left.

No constitutional objection was made to this bill at the hearings. No constitutional objection can be urged here, and there is no injustice to the carrier. It is a general principle of maritime law, Mr. President, that the freight charge for the carrying of goods from one port to another includes the expense of discharging the cargo. If the London clause is eliminated the steamship owners will not be prevented from including this in their freight rate, making it a part of it. What we ask is that when we ship our goods and agree to pay a certain amount of freight that shall be the end of it. We object to this clause, because it is an arbitrary, noncompetitive clause and puts us at a disadvantage in respect to other countries. As the report of Mr. Choate said, and I read from it a moment ago, it penalizes American goods and subjects them to a charge that no other goods are subjected to anywhere.

If there ever was a meritorious bill, if there ever was a just bill, it is this one. It simply endeavors to put the American shipper and the American producer on a parity in the port of London with the shippers and producers of other countries. It can work no substantial injury to shipowners, because whatever is just and right they can include in their freight rate and make it a part of it. When it is included in the freight rate it is subject to competition, and we ask to have the benefit of that competition and that fluctuation in rates which always prevail. There is no reason under the sun why the ships plying in the North Atlantic trade should in this way penalize and put a burden upon American shippers which is not put upon shippers from any other country.

It will work no substantial injury to the shipowners, and it is a great advantage to the shippers, and I submit, Mr. President, that in this age, when we are confronted with trusts and monopolies and unlawful combinations on all sides, when one of the great problems is how to regulate and control trusts and monopolies and protect the American people against them, we should accept the opportunity now offered to protect the American farmer, the American lumberman, the American wheat raiser, the American cattle raiser, the American producer from one of the greatest trusts and monopolies, bigger now than ever because of this great new combination of Mr. Morgan's. It was bad enough before, but under present conditions, and as they are likely to be in the future, the people of this country are at the mercy of a devilfish of a monopoly, from which everyone of us ought to pray before we go to bed to be delivered.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] is necessarily absent. When the bill first came up he gave notice of an amendment, which in his behalf I now offer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MASON in the chair). The Senator from Maine on behalf of the Senator from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert as section 2 the following:

This act shall not in any way apply to foreign port charges, lighterage, expense of discharging, or other charge which it is agreed in a written charter party of the whole ship shall be paid by the charterer, consignee, or owner of the goods.

Mr. NELSON. I suppose the Senator wants to go on with his speech. I wish to say something about the amendment.

Mr. HALE. We shall not get through to-day, of course. Perhaps the Senator had better, if he chooses, speak to the amendment now.

Mr. NELSON. I should like to have the amendment sent up to me. It has not been printed that I am aware of.

Mr. HALE. I do not know that it has been printed.

Mr. NELSON. I have no recollection of it, except that the Senator from Massachusetts said he had an amendment to offer.

Mr. HALE. He gave notice of the amendment, and it was read at the time.

Mr. NELSON. This is the amendment:

SEC. 2. This act shall not in any way apply to foreign port charges, lighterage, expense of discharging, or other charge which it is agreed in a written charter party of the whole ship shall be paid by the charterer, consignee, or owner of the goods.

A part of this amendment is mere surplusage. "This act shall not in any way apply to foreign port charges and lighterage." It does not affect them, I wish to say to the Senator from Maine, and I think he will agree with me in this view. It does not relate to foreign port charges or lighterage. It leaves that just as it is to-day. But the other part of the amendment, "expense of discharging or other charge," if adopted, defeats the entire purpose of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Maine.

Mr. NELSON. The amendment ought to be rejected. One part of it is perfectly harmless. The other part of it is utterly destructive of the entire provisions of the bill.

Mr. HALE. Well, let us have a vote upon the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the adoption of the amendment. [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it.

Mr. HALE. Let us have a division.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of opinion that no quorum is present, and he will order a call of the Senate.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Allison,	Deboe,	Hale,	Morgan,
Bacon,	Depew,	Hanna,	Nelson,
Bard,	Dolliver,	Harris,	Perkins,
Bate,	Dubois,	Jones, Ark.	Pritchard,
Berry,	Fairbanks,	Kean,	Scott,
Burnham,	Foraker,	Kittredge,	Simmons,
Burton,	Foster, La.	McEnery,	Stewart,
Carmack,	Foster, Wash.	McMillan,	Teller,
Clapp,	Frye,	Mallory,	Warren.
Clark, Wyo.	Gallinger,	Mason,
Clay,	Gamble,	Millard,
Cockrell,	Gibson,	Mitchell,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-five Senators have responded to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, the Senator from Maine desires to address the Senate on the bill. It is now nearly 2 o'clock, when the unfinished business comes up, and I do not think the Senator cares to go on for the few minutes before 2. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the bill may be taken up at the close of the routine morning business every morning until it is disposed of, not to interfere with appropriation bills or with notices already given.

Mr. HALE. I am entirely content with that.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will say——

Mr. BERRY. There is an agreement for Wednesday morning.

Mr. NELSON. It is not to interfere where notices have been given and agreements have been made. It is to continue to be taken up every morning at the close of the routine morning business, not, however, to interfere with appropriation bills or with cases where notices have been given or agreements for consideration have been made.

Mr. HALE. That is fair.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have no objection to that.

Mr. HALE. It is entirely satisfactory to me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the pending bill may receive consideration every morning after the routine morning business is disposed of until a vote is finally reached, not, however, to interfere with any notices given or with appropriation bills, or with any agreements already entered into.

Mr. HALE. Let me say that I do not think the agreement will result in anything quite as formidable as it indicates. I do not expect to take much time, and I presume that we shall reach a vote on Monday morning, so that the practical question of interfering with other matters is not likely to arise.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will take the liberty of adding to the request that the limitation of debate under Rule VIII shall not apply.

Mr. NELSON. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Minnesota? The Chair hears none, and the order is made.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, there is on the table a concurrent resolution from the House, and I ask that the time before 2 may be used in its consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives, which was read:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, June 7, 1902.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the sundry civil appropriation bill (H. R. 13123) are authorized to consider and recommend the inclusion in said bill of necessary appropriations to carry out the several objects authorized in the "Act to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, and for other purposes," approved June 6, 1902.

Mr. ALLISON. The resolution is sufficiently explanatory. I ask unanimous consent that it may be put upon its passage.

The concurrent resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON subsequently said: On reflection, I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the concurrent resolution from the House was just passed may be reconsidered, and that the resolution may lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the vote by which the concurrent resolution from the House was just passed may be reconsidered. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the resolution will lie on the table.

STORAGE RESERVOIRS IN ARIZONA.

Mr. DUBOIS. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (H. R. 12797) to ratify act No. 65 of the Twenty-first Arizona legislature.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It confirms, ratifies, and declares valid act No. 65 of the Twenty-first legislative assembly of the Territory of Arizona, entitled "An act to authorize any county in the Territory of Arizona having an assessed valuation of $8,000,000 or over to prepare plans and specifications for a storage reservoir or reservoirs, dam or dams, to acquire the site for the same, and to provide the necessary funds to defray the expenses incurred.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OSAGE RIVER IN MISSOURI.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask unanimous consent for the passage of the bill (S. 5906) declaring the Osage River to be not a navigable stream above the point where the line between the counties of Benton and St. Clair crosses said river. The bill is five lines long, and has been favorably reported from the Committee on Commerce.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HENRY I. SMITH.

Mr. FOSTER of Washington submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8794) granting an increase of pension to Henry I. Smith, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed by the Senate insert "forty."

A. G. FOSTER,
J. R. BURTON,
E. W. CARMACK,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
J. N. W. RUMPLE,
ELIAS DEEMER,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

LEVI HATCHETT.

Mr. DEBOE submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 2975) granting an increase of pension to Levi Hatchett, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its amendment.

WM. J. DEBOE,
E. W. CARMACK,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
HENRY R. GIBSON,
A. B. DARRAGH,
RUD. KLEBERG,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

ISTHMIAN CANAL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3110) to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I very much regret that my friend the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HANNA], who addressed the Senate yesterday, has been unable to get his speech into the RECORD this morning. There were a number of things he said that I would have been very glad to reply to to-day, and I have been depending on seeing precisely what he said by an examination of the RECORD this morning.

The Senator from Ohio in starting out found some fault with some remarks of mine made day before yesterday and, among others, the fact that I had parenthetically referred to the Isthmian Canal Commission as "his Commission." I think the Senator is entirely too sensitive. I did not mean at all by that to say that the Commission was one of his creation. I meant nothing of the kind. I did not mean to cast any reflection either upon the distinguished Senator from Ohio or the Commission. I simply made that reference, as I said, parenthetically, when I was speaking of the Commission which the Senator from Ohio was relying on and quoting from, and therefore for the time being it was his Commission.

Only that and nothing more.

Neither did I mean any reflection in that remark, or in any statement that I made in the whole course of my speech, upon the Commission. Upon the contrary, I know the Isthmian Canal Commission, as also the Nicaraguan Commission, were composed of able, high-minded, experienced, and scientific men, selected by reason of their well-known capacity to deal with the great subject committed to them. And for one, Mr. President, I am disposed to follow that Commission, as I understand it, but in following it I do not propose to rely solely and merely upon a few lines of recommendation in one part of the report of one Commission or in one part of that of another, but I propose to take all they say in all of their reports, as well their findings of fact as their conclusions and recommendations. I propose to consider their statements of fact in the various reports which they have made, in connection with their conclusions, and then to come to such a conclusion as I may be able to reach, after a careful consideration and analysis of all these, and in this manner reach a determination as to which is the better route to select for an isthmian canal

Mr. President, the Nicaraguan Commission, which was composed of Rear-Admiral Walker, Colonel Hains, and Professor Haupt, dealt mainly with the Nicaraguan route, and their report, as I stated the other day, was unanimous, unambiguous, and positive to the effect that the Nicaraguan route is an entirely feasible and practicable route. There is no getting away from that conclusion, looking to that report alone. Their statement and finding of facts point directly in that direction, and their conclusions and recommendations are to the same effect, because it will be remembered that the recommendation of the Nicaraguan Commission was in favor of constructing an isthmian canal over the Nicaragua route.

Now, what else? Those same three commissioners constitute three of the nine commissioners that make up the Isthmian Canal Commission. They made a preliminary report in November, 1900, in which they stated that, so far as they had progressed, they were decidedly of the opinion that the Nicaragua route is the better route of the two over which and along which to construct an isthmian canal.

They then proceeded with further investigations running up to November, 1901, when they submit their final report, in which they give a great number of facts bearing upon each route. and finally conclude with the statement that, all things considered, the most feasible and practicable route for the construction of a canal under the direction and control of the United States is the Nicaragua route.

Now, then, Mr. President, when the Nicaraguan Commission made their investigation they simply investigated, without regard to cost, as to the most feasible and practicable route on which to construct a canal, and this was also the case, as it seems to me, with the Isthmian Commission, taking their report as a whole, and not taking one part merely in the case of their report of the 16th of November, 1901.

Within a month or two, however—just how long I can not now state—from the time this final report is made a supplemental report is made in which they say what? Why, simply in view of the fact that this whole Panama business can be bought for $40,000,000 they now think the Panama route is the proper route. A route, Mr. President, that was the most feasible and the most practicable on the 16th day of November, 1901, became the less feasible and the less practicable route in January, 1902, the whole thing turning upon the simple question of cost.

Mr. President, I undertake to say that if the Senate will take up the history of these investigations, if it will take up these three or four reports made by the two commissions and examine them in the light also of the testimony that has been taken by the Committee on Interoceanic Canals of this body and examine the two conclusions and recommendations in the first report, the one in favor of the Nicaraguan route and the other in favor of the Panama route, construing this latest recommendation in the light of the former recommendations and of all the testimony and findings of fact in the case, you must come to the conclusion that the real recommendation, after all, of the Isthmian Canal Commission is in favor of the Nicaragua route.

The Senator from Ohio yesterday discussed at some length the feasibility of the construction of the Bohio dam, on the Panama route, and relied upon that great engineer, Morison, and we all concede he is a great engineer. Now, Mr. President, what is the testimony of Mr. Morison upon the very subject of the construction of the Bohio dam? He tells us that there is nothing in all the engineering experiments that have ever been tried in the world that will stand as a justification of a conclusion upon our part that, without question, that dam can be made a success. It is just to the contrary, as I will show from his own lips.

I refer, first, to the testimony of Professor Haupt, not for the purpose of reading particularly what Professor Haupt says, because I might be taken to task for it by the distinguished Senator from Ohio, as he seems to think that, for some reason or other, Professor Haupt is not a very credible witness. I do not know why. He is one of the Commission selected by President McKinley to investigate this great work. He was selected on both Commissions—on the Nicaraguan Commission and on the Isthmian Canal Commission. The Senator from Ohio yesterday eulogized that Commission very properly, and I join in that eulogy as to all of the members of that distinguished Commission; but unfortunately for the Senator from Ohio, after eulogizing the Commission very properly in the manner he did, he, in the next breath, assails one of its members and tells you, Mr. President, and this Senate that Professor Haupt is for some reason unworthy of belief.

The distinguished Senator from Ohio was hardly logical in that part of his speech. But I want to call attention to what Engineer Commissioner Morison, since he made his report in January last in favor of the Panama route, has said upon the subject of the construction of the Bohio dam. On page 557 of the hearings before the Senate Committee on Interoceanic Canals, Senate Document 253, part 2, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session, Professor Haput was on the witness stand before the committee of the Senate when this dialogue took place:

Senator FOSTER. I believe I will ask you this question: I read from Mr. Morison on the construction of the Bohio dams, in which he says:—

Then he quotes from the article written by Mr. Morison, as follows:

It involves novel and untried features, and few engineers, even among those who feel that they can construct it, would be ready to say in advance how the work could be done. The difficulties, taken in connection with the climate and other surroundings, are enormous.

That is Mr. Morison's statement in a paper that he prepared and which was to be read, and I believe was read, before a certain scientific society——

Mr. MORGAN. The Society of American Engineers.

Mr. MITCHELL. Before the Society of American Engineers. After quoting this extract from the statement of Engineer Morison, Professor Haupt was asked by Senator FOSTER of Louisiana:

Do you share that opinion?

Mr. HAUPT. I indorse that opinion; yes, sir; and have objected to that project for those reasons, but Professor Burr has had considerable experience in deep foundation, and he assures us positively that it can be done successfully, and I deferred to his perhaps better judgment in the matter. I still feel, however, that there is a very great doubt in regard to that dam.

Senator FOSTER. Are there any such unknown or uncertain elements entering into the construction of the Nicaragua route?

Mr. HAUPT. No; there are not.

Senator HARRIS. There really is no point along the entire Nicaragua route, no question which is not well within the limitation of ordinary, you may say, engineering experience.

Mr. HAUPT. That is correct; yes, sir. There are three possible dam sites, any of which would be better than that one on the Nicaragua route. Each dam site is better than that. The San Carlos dam site is better, and so is that at Ochoa; so is the present Conchuda, and it is possible by further boring that we may find a still better site.

Commissioner Morison undertook to explain later. I wish the Senate to have all sides of this controversy, and anything that is a benefit to our friends of the minority of the committee I am perfectly willing shall be disclosed here, and that nothing shall be hidden. Commissioner Morison voluntarily came back upon the witness stand, after he had been thus quoted by Commissioner Haupt, and undertook to explain away why he had said what he did say in the paper read before the Society of American Engineers. I will read what he said about it, to be found on page 605 of the same document, where he made a statement under oath. After several questions had been propounded to him and answered, and as he was about to leave the stand, Senator Hanna having made this statement:

Senator HANNA. Of course it is a very small percentage. I do not know of anything more that I care to ask.

Then Mr. Morison voluntarily comes forward and makes this statement in explanation of his statement about the Bohio dam in his address to the Society of American Engineers:

Mr. MORISON. There is one thing that I would like to say before we go.

He was not asked about it; no question was put to him; his examination had been completed, but he evidently felt that some kind of an explanation was due on the subject. So he said:

Mr. MORISON. There is one thing that I would like to say before we go. I see that a previous witness has introduced a paper that I prepared on the subject of the Bohio dam. That paper was prepared with a view of bringing the matter before a collection of engineers for discussion, to see what criticisms could be made on what I considered a satisfactory solution of the dam problem at a very much less expense than the Commission's plan. It will be discussed at a meeting in New York on the 5th of next month. When I stated there that I considered the Commission's plan—I have not the paper here or I would give you the exact words—when I stated there that I considered that the Isthmian Canal Commission's plan involved very great difficulties, I certainly did not mean that it could not be done. My own judgment is that, if I was going to use a core wall, I should not put the core wall in by the use of the pneumatic process; but I should select a place where I should have to go deeper than 128 feet, and would use the method that has been used in sinking very deep foundations in the rivers of India—that of dredging through wells. The paper was prepared for the purpose I have mentioned.

Senator HANNA. Of creating a discussion?

Mr. MORISON. It was prepared to bring forward the plan and have it discussed, and to get the opinions of engineers.

Now, then, you have Mr. Morison, who was on yesterday by the Senator from Ohio very properly eulogized as one of the greatest engineers in America and perhaps in the world, a member of the Commission, who does not agree in the first place with his cocommissioners in regard to the kind and character of dam that should be constructed at Bohio, and he says so. In so much doubt apparently is he in regard to the ability of engineers to construct such a dam as is suggested by the Isthmian Canal Commissioners that he deems it necessary and important to bring up the question for discussion before eminent engineers. That discussion, Mr. President, should have taken place before the Isthmian Canal Commission undertook to tell us which was the proper route on which to build the canal.

All these discussions as to the different engineering feats necessary to be accomplished before you can make a canal there should have been had and definite conclusions determined in advance of recommendations by the Commission, so there could have been no question of doubt about the success of the canal. Is the United States going to invest some $180,000,000 in a project the ultimate success of which lies in the region of uncertainty? All agree and tell you that the vital point in both those routes is the dam; that unless a dam can be made a certainty and with certainty maintained at Bohio, on the Panama route, or unless a dam can be made and maintained at Conchuda, on the Nicaraguan route, then no canal ought ever to be thought of being constructed on either of the routes.

I say, therefore, that all the testimony—and you have got three of the Isthmian Canal Commissioners joining in this doubt about the ability to construct a dam at Bohio such as is recommended—all the testimony goes to show that there is no question about the ability to construct and maintain a dam at Conchuda, on the Nicaragua route, or at any one of two or three other places, if not at Conchuda. Should a dam constructed at Conchuda give way, there is nothing to prevent the construction of another dam at two or three other places on the Nicaragua route, while, in so far as the dam at Bohio is concerned, if you should construct it, and, unfortunately, it should not stand, there is no other place on the Panama route where a dam can be constructed. There is but one place on the Panama route, that at Bohio, and there you must make it a success or otherwise the whole scheme fails. But, Mr. President, I am taking up too much time, and I will now proceed with some remarks that I had intended to make.

Three principal reasons have been suggested why the Panama route should be selected:

First. Assuming that we pay the New Panama Canal Company $40,000,000 for its plant and franchises, and assuming, further, that the estimates of the Isthmian Canal Commission are in the close neighborhood of reasonable accuracy, that the total cost of the construction of the canal on the Panama route will be $5,630,704 less than the construction of a canal on the Nicaragua route.

Second. That the estimated annual cost of maintenance and operation of the canal on the Nicaragua route is $1,300,000 greater than at Panama; and Third. That the Panama is the shorter route.

The last two of these objections were considered by the Isthmian Canal Commission in their preliminary report, and also in their final report of November 16, 1901, and the answers as to them were regarded as conclusive. In other words, the Commission regarded the advantages that would accrue from the construction of the canal on the Nicaragua route, and which would not attach from the construction of a canal on the Panama route, much more than outweighed those two objections. This, therefore, really leaves but one of the three objections open to discussion in so far as the reports of the Commission are concerned. This will be considered by me later. These several propositions have been already in part considered, and will be further as I proceed.

The Senator from Ohio on yesterday discussed at some length the question as to the distances of the respective routes, and in order to show that the shorter route was by way of Panama he drew lines from the port of San Francisco, from a port in the Philippine Islands, and from ports in China and Japan to Brito, the western end of the Nicaragua route, and then he drew a line from those respective ports to Panama. Of course, Mr. President, the route to Brito is much longer—not very much, but somewhat longer—than the route to Panama from those particular ports, or from any port west of Panama; but you must consider the whole distance clear through to New York, to Liverpool, and to New Orleans, in order to determine which is the shorter route.

It is urged that the fact that the Panama is the shorter route, requiring but twelve hours for the passage of an average ship through the same, while on the Nicaragua route twenty-one additional hours are required, or in all thirty-three hours, is an argument in favor of the Panama route. But the answer to all this from the standpoint of American interests, American trade, American commerce, and indeed international trade and commerce, is found in the fact that the distance from San Francisco to New York is 377 miles, to New Orleans 579 miles, and to Liverpool 386 miles greater by the Panama route than by the Nicaragua route. The time it would take vessels to pass over even the shorter of these distances is, as stated by the Isthmian Canal Commission in their preliminary report of November 30, 1900—I quote from the report of the Commission—"much greater than the difference in time of transit through the canals."

Now, I take not the statement of the Senator from Ohio, but the report of his Commission—and I wish to say again I only mean by that the Commission on which the Senator relies, as I explained a few minutes ago—and that Commission—the Isthmian Canal Commission—say "much greater than the difference in time of transit through the canals," to say nothing of the infinitely greater commercial advantages that would come to the United States by the construction of the Nicaragua Canal than from that of a canal on the Panama route.

The difference in time of sailing vessels passing between the eastern and western coast ports of the United States by way of the Panama and Nicaragua routes respectively is, on an average, more than fifteen days, the route via Panama being that much longer; while at times, owing to the deadly calms on the Panama route, the difference is as much as thirty or even forty days.

Mr. President, there was one branch of this general subject which my friend from Ohio on yesterday passed over very lightly, and it is passed over in the views of the minority of the committee as though they were skating over thin ice. The distinguished Senator from Ohio referred to it as the great opportunity that has come to us, and I now refer to the propriety, to the advisability, of the United States tacking on to one of the greatest frauds and pieces of corruption that has ever been disclosed since the world began, and I propose now to attract the attention of the Senate to something of the history of the old Panama Canal Company, as well as to the history of the New Panama Canal Company, which finally has led up, after innumerable disgraceful failures upon their part, to a proposition to sell out to the United States their old wares for $40,000,000, and we propose, according to the views of the minority of the committee and according to the amendment proposed by the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], to consider seriously a proposition which, in my judgment, will involve the United States in interminable controversies for a hundred years to come should we make the purchase, and I will give my reasons why I think so. I do not propose to stand here and by mere dogmatic assertions ask that any attention be given to what I say. I want the Senate to know the facts and then to determine whether we can afford to hitch on to this rotten concern across the sea.

CAN THE UNITED STATES AFFORD TO ACCEPT THE TENDER OF THE NEW PANAMA CANAL COMPANY AND PAY THAT COMPANY FOR ITS PLANT AND CONCESSIONS THE ENORMOUS SUM OF $40,000,000?

I come now to consider the question: Shall we adopt either what is known as the "Spooner amendment," which was introduced in the Senate by the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin on January 28 last, or that of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], introduced more recently? I respectfully, but earnestly and with entire confidence in my position, assert that for many reasons the Senate should not accept either.

The Spooner amendment, briefly stated, proposes to authorize the President of the United States to acquire, for and on behalf of the United States, at a cost not exceeding $40,000,000, the rights, concessions, grants of land, rights of way, unfinished work, plants, and all maps, plans, drawings, records, and other property, real, personal, and mixed, of every name and nature, owned by the New Panama Canal Company of France on the Isthmus of Panama and in Paris, including 68,863 shares of the Panama Railroad Company, alleged to be owned by said canal company, provided satisfactory title to all said property can be obtained.

The amendment also authorizes the President to acquire from the Republic of Colombia, on behalf of the United States, the necessary concessions, and a sum of money—no amount named—such as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of the bill is appropriated. And in the event of the purchase being consummated from the New Panama Canal Company, the President is authorized to construct the canal on the Panama route from the Caribbean Sea to the Pacific Ocean.

The amendment further provides that in the event the President is unable to obtain for the United States a satisfactory title to the property of the New Panama Canal Company and such control of the necessary territory of the Republic of Columbia "within a reasonable time and upon reasonable terms"—just what we might consider a reasonable time or reasonable terms I am not able to say; there might be a very great difference of opinion even among the advisers of the President as to that—then the President having first obtained for the United States similar control of the necessary territory from Costa Rica and Nicaragua, upon terms which he may consider reasonable, for the construction, maintenance, operation, and protection of a canal connecting the Caribbean Sea with the Pacific Ocean, on what is commonly known as the Nicaragua route, he shall direct the Secretary of War to excavate and construct a ship canal from a point on the shore of the Caribbean Sea near Greytown, by way of Lake Nicaragua, to a point near Brito on the Pacific Ocean. And it is further provided that appropriations may from time to time hereafter be made to meet contracts made by the Secretary of War, not to exceed in the aggregate $135,000,000 should the Panama route be adopted, or $180,000,000 should the Nicaragua route be adopted. This, in brief, is the substance of the proposition of Senator SPOONER and of the minority of the committee.

While in that proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], the question as to the determination of the route is left entirely to the President of the United States, and he is authorized to proceed with the construction of the canal on whatever route he selects, and the sum of $10,000,000 is appropriated toward the project contemplated, and it is provided that the sums required under any contract which may be entered into shall be paid for as appropriations may from time to time be hereafter made on warrants to be drawn by the President of the United States not to exceed in the aggregate $180,000,000. This bill of Senator HOAR makes no reference whatever to the proposed purchase from the Panama Canal Company.

I find that many have supposed that what is known as the Spooner amendment, and which has been adopted by the minority of the committee, left the whole matter of the selection of a route to the President. This is not by any means the case. Upon the contrary, this substitute, proposed by the minority, directs the President to ascertain, in the first place, whether a satisfactory title to the property in question can be given by the New Panama Canal Company, and if he finds that such satisfactory title can be obtained, then the President is compelled, whatever may be his individual opinion as to which of the two routes is the better one, to pay over to the New Panama Canal Company $40,000,000 and proceed with the construction of the canal on the Panama route.

And in the meantime, that is, until it is settled whether a satisfactory title can be obtained or not, the President has no power whatever to proceed with negotiations with the Republics of Nicaragua and Costa Rica for the purpose of obtaining the necessary concessions for the construction of a canal over that route, and it is only in the event that a point is reached where it is determined that a satisfactory title can not be had from the New Panama Canal Company that the President has any authority whatever to take any steps, either by negotiations with the Republics of Nicaragua and Costa Rica, or in any other respect, looking to the construction of the canal over the Nicaragua route. I do not know how long it would take, nor do you, Mr. President, or any other Senator here. We all know, however, it will take a long time to make an investigation of that character by the President of the United States, even with all the aids at his command.

THE SELECTION OF A ROUTE FOR AN ISTHMIAN CANAL IS A PURELY LEGISLATIVE FUNCTION AND SHOULD BE EXERCISED BY CONGRESS AND THE PRESIDENT, AND NOT BY THE PRESIDENT ALONE.

In considering these several propositions I respectfully insist that the duty of selecting a route for an isthmian canal is a legislative duty and not an Executive duty. It is a duty of the most important character, of tremendous responsibility, resting upon the Congress and the Executive and not upon the Executive alone. For Congress to shirk such a responsibility is to cowardly surrender one of its constitutional prerogatives and one of its highest duties and turn it over without even a plausible excuse to and impose the duty on the President.

Mr. DIETRICH. Is it not true that the Spooner amendment is merely a legislative measure and only calls upon the President to see that the title is perfect?

Mr. MITCHELL. I will come to that point in a moment. It is quasi legislative.

The 80,000,000 people of this country, interested in this great work, have a right to demand that the selection of a route for an isthmian canal shall be the result of the best judgment, after a full investigation, of a majority of the four hundred and forty-odd men who compose the Congress of the United States, and not the judgment of one man only, although that one man may be the President of the United States.

These 80,000,000 people have a right to solemnly insist that the important question as to whether this Government shall pay the French canal company $40,000,000 for its assets shall not be left to the determination of any one man, though he be the President of the United States, but that it shall be determined by a majority of the two Houses of the American Congress. As well, and with as much propriety, might Congress relinquish its right and abandon its duty to determine the amount and character of the appropriations for the improvements of rivers and harbors, or if not, indeed, the amount, when and where and how the same shall be expended; or as to the appropriations for the sundry civil expenses, or if not, indeed, the amount, how and when and where the same shall be applied; or the size and capacity of the ships of war to be built, and where, whether in the Government or private yards, and shift all these purely legislative duties on the shoulders of the President.

I am not denying the constitutional power of Congress to transfer this responsibility of determining as to the route, or even of the other question as to the purchase for $40,000,000, although it must be admitted this choice upon the part of Congress of any agency to perform what is, to say the least, a quasi legislative act borders very closely, indeed, on the line where the power of Congress to transfer its power ceases.

The sovereign power to make national laws is vested in Congress, and as a general rule it is a settled maxim, delegatus non potest delegare—that that power to whose judgment, wisdom, and patriotism this high prerogative has been intrusted can not relieve itself of the responsibility by choosing other agencies upon which the power shall be devolved.

But there are exceptions to this general rule, I concede, and I frankly admit the right to confer these powers upon the Executive comes within that exception—this upon the principle that while Congress may not delegate its power to make a law it can make a law to delegate a power to determine some fact or state of things upon which the law makes or intends to make its own action dependent. It is upon this principle that the provision of the judiciary act, which empowers the Federal courts to adopt rules of practice and forms of procedure, is held to be a valid delegation, although the discretion conferred is quasilegislative.

But while I concede the constitutional power, I most emphatically deny the wisdom and propriety of its exercise. Especially should I do this in a matter involving such tremendous interests and responsibilities of such immense magnitude, not only in the matter of the expenditure of such a vast amount of money, but which also affects so vitally the future of our national and international commerce—our domestic and foreign trade.

It has been suggested if we fail to buy out the French people and complete the Panama Canal, but construct the Nicaragua Canal, that either the present New Panama Canal Company or some other syndicate or company will complete it, and as a consequence we will suffer loss in some way in the future. This was a part of the argument on yesterday of the distinguished Senator from Ohio. The answer to all this is that such a contingency is by no means either as probable or as much to be feared as this: That if we abandon the Nicaragua route and adopt the Panama route we may suffer the humiliation of seeing, at no distant day, our commerce passed through a Nicaragua Canal and be compelled to pay toll to some foreign syndicate, to say nothing of the further humiliation of being deprived of our coastwise trade. If we take the Panama we can not expect, in view of existing geographic and commercial positions, to play the part of the dog in the manger.

The intercoastal commerce of the United States, together with the local traffic along the Nicaragua route, will pay the interest on the cost of construction, to say nothing of the commerce and trade from northern Asia, and the advantages of subsidies from Nicaragua and Costa Rico, which will be readily granted to any private company constructing the Nicaragua Canal.

Far better, Mr. President, a thousand times over, pay the new canal company of France $40,000,000, fill up the practically already filled up ditch they have been a quarter of a century in digging, destroy the practically useless, out of date, and worn-out machinery, burn to ashes the old maps and drawings which they propose to sell to the United States for the sum of $2,000,000, and abandon the route to the bats and the owls, the vampires and the monkeys, the indestructible bacteria that fill its miasmatic swamps and which constantly spread death on every side, and to the race of men whom God placed there in the beginning.

But that those connected with the New Panama Canal Company expect to make princely fortunes out of this deal, in the event they can induce the United States to buy them out for $40,000,000, is made apparent by the testimony of their own American agent and representative, Mr. Edouard Lampre, as the secretary-general of the Compagnie Nouvelle du Panama, in charge of the New Panama Canal Company, now the owner and controller of all the property of the old Panama Canal Company, including such additions as have been added to it by the new company, and included in all which is the ownership of 68,900 of the 70,000 of the shares of the Panama Railroad Company. In Mr. Lampre's testimony, taken before the Interoceanic Canal Committee of this body on January 11 last, he, having previously stated that the total amount originally subscribed to the new company was 60,000,000 francs, and that the company had now on hand in cash in the treasury 16,000,000 francs, said:

Senator TURNER. How much money has the new company put into this enterprise?
Mr. LAMPRE. At the present time?
Senator TURNER. Yes.
Mr. LAMPRE. I think I stated at the beginning of this hearing that as far as I can recollect at this time about 16,000,000 francs are left from 60,000,000 francs originally subscribed.
The CHAIRMAN. I expect to examine M. Lampre on that point. Do you mean the stock?
Senator TURNER. How much money has the company actually expended in the enterprise?
Mr. LAMPRE. The difference between 60,000,000 francs and 16,000,000 francs; that is to say, assuming my figures to be correct, we would have expended 44,000,000 francs.
Senator TURNER. That is eight or nine millions dollars. If the new company are to get 40 per cent of the $40,000,000 they would be making considerable money?
Mr. LAMPRE. I do not know what the percentage will be.
Senator TURNER. That is a matter for the arbitrators?
Mr. LAMPRE. That is so.

This testimony followed a statement by Mr. Lampre that by an agreement between the liquidator of the Old Panama Canal Company and the New Panama Canal Company the liquidator was to receive for the benefit of the shareholders of the old company 60 per cent of whatever amount might be received from the sale of the Panama Canal Company's property by the New Panama Canal Company.

I call the attention of Senators to this point. Here, in the first place, when the old Panama Canal Company became bankrupt and went into the French bankruptcy courts and a liquidator was appointed, which corresponds to a receiver in American courts, an arrangement was made, under the direction of the court, by which it was agreed that the new company should be organized, which is the New Panama Canal Company that now proposes to sell out to us, and that that company should go on and complete the canal, not sell it out to somebody, and that 60 per cent of the net profits that should arise from the completion of the canal by the new company should go to this liquidator, this receiver, for the benefit of the shareholders and bondholders in the old Panama Canal Company. That took place in 1894, eight years ago. The new company was organized, and a lot of men—I will come to that later—who had been mixed up in a criminal way with the old company, who were being prosecuted, some of whom were convicted, were compelled to take the stock of the new company. I will come to that, however, later on.

Within the last year this arrangement by which the new company was to go on and complete the canal and under which the liquidator should receive 60 per cent, was abandoned and a new arrangement was made by which the new company were to sell out all they had, their plant, their franchises, and everything to anybody. It did not say to whom nor did it say for what amount. There was no amount fixed in the order of the French court at which they should be authorized to sell. But it was stipulated that 60 per cent of whatever amount was received should go to the liquidator for the benefit of the shareholders and bondholders of the old company. So you will see, as I proceed, that there are questions of grave moment here as to whether the shareholders and bondholders have been cut off of all rights by virtue of the proceedings in the bankruptcy courts. But not only that, suppose they have not been cut off and suppose there is a failure subsequently upon the part of the liquidator to turn over 60 per cent of the $40,000,000 to those shareholders and bondholders. Is it not apparent that they will come forward and say "You have become the beneficiary of our property," and say to us through the Congress of the United States or through our courts that we have come into possession of property which their money built and out of which they have been swindled? But I will come to that more specifically later on.

THE DARK HISTORY OF BOTH THE OLD AND THE NEW PANAMA CANAL COMPANIES.

I now propose to attract the attention of the Senate to the repulsive and disgusting history of both the old and the new Panama Canal companies. And with that history, with all its repulsiveness, before the Senate, I propose to inquire, in the name of the American people, whether the Senate of the United States can afford to link its fortunes with a scheme, the putrefying stench from which has filled the nostrils of the nations, and caused respectable business, social, and political mankind to turn aside in disgust.

Can it be possible the United States would seriously contemplate attaching itself to or involving itself with a foreign enterprise which, in its time, under another form and under another name, and within the last ten years, developed an explosion which laid bare to the world, shocking the sensibilities of mankind, the most tremendous scheme of legislative corruption, journalistic venality, moral, social, and political abandon, ever uncovered in any country or in any age; an explosion which left its dark stains of infamy upon the theretofore stainless foreheads and unsullied names of men who, until then, stood among the foremost in the ranks of the great scientific and progressive men of the age, and consigned the great French engineer, Ferdinand de Lesseps, to the ignominy of the prison cell?

I undertake to say in all history never has any scheme or proposed enterprise or project been so literally saturated from start to finish with false pretenses, misrepresentation, corruption, and fraud as has been the scheme having for its alleged purpose the construction by the French people of an isthmian canal over the Panama route. There never has been an hour from the time since in 1875 Naval Lieut. Lucien Napoleon Bonaparte Wyse obtained what is known as the Wyse concession until the complete bankruptcy of the company in 1888 that every step of those connected with the enterprise has not been marked by the most glaring deception, corruption, and fraud. The great engineer, Ferdinand de Lesseps, flushed and bewildered with the honors that came to him in connection with the construction and completion of the Suez Canal, imagined his great name would command money by the millions for any scheme with which his name was connected, and while he may have thought the Panama Canal would eventually be built, it is clearly evident to all those who will carefully study the history of his connection with the Panama Canal that, viewed in the light of historical events, his principal purpose was that of making for himself and a few friends princely fortunes, and this, too, through a systematic course of false pretenses, misrepresentations, corruption, and fraud.

Neither the well-merited high standing in this body of the able and distinguished Senator from Wisconsin, nor that of the distinguished members of the minority of the committee nor that of any other Senator, as it seems to me, can be of sufficient weight to justify a belief in the minds of a majority of this high tribunal that it would be wise to have the United States link its fortunes with this New Panama Canal Company, which is neither more nor less than a combination of the survivors of the old, defunct, deposed, bankrupt Panama Canal Company, masquerading under a new name and in a new dress. It may be said by some, Why refer to the scandals, to the shortcomings, to the defaults, to the misdeeds, to the bankruptcies, and to the crimes of the old Panama Canal Company?

I will tell you, Mr. President, the reason why. The New Panama Canal Company which now proposes to sell to the United States a certain property, and which we propose to buy, according to the Spooner amendment, paying for the same the enormous sum of $40,000,000, was obtained by them principally, or the greater portion of it, from the old Panama Canal Company through questionable bankruptcy proceedings in the French courts. A determination, therefore, of the legality of the title of the new company to this property necessarily involves a most thorough examination of the entire history of the old company from its inception to the end. And it is proper in this connection to inquire not only whether the new company has a strictly legal title to the property which it proposes to sell us, but also whether there are any moral and equitable rights outstanding upon the part of the French stockholders and bondholders, not only of the old but of the new company, which would lift their hydra heads in our equitable courts and before Congress for innumerable years to come, basing their claims upon the ground that the United States, having become the beneficiary of the property of the new canal company, is in equity and good morals bound to respond to these equitable claims.

The Spooner amendment, I take it, simply deals with a strictly legal title; but whether it does or not, I submit that the United States must, before we can engage in this enterprise, look beyond that and inquire whether there are any equities here that will not in the future come to harrass and annoy us. For one, I submit to the Senate my deliberate conviction, after a most thorough investigation of the whole proposition, that the purchase of the New Panama Canal property for which they claim $40,000,000, even could the same be obtained for $100, would be a bad bargain for the United States.

When Wyse obtained his first concession, in 1875, no surveys of a route had ever been made, except by the American engineer Menocal, made that same year. On presentation of this concession to the Paris Geographic Society, that society, while manifesting a friendly disposition, declared scientific surveys a necessity in order to determine as to the feasibility of the scheme, but at the same time announced its lack of funds. Then, in December, 1876, Wyse and his aids went to Colon and then to Panama for the purpose, not of finding the best route for a canal, as is well known, but for the purpose of finding the best route within the Wyse concession of 1875. No survey, however, was made, and the next year, 1877, Wyse and his principal associate, Reclus, returned again to Panama. And, to show the absolute insincerity and lack of good faith upon the part of these men, and that their purpose was not to lay a proper foundation for the construction of a canal, but rather to lay the foundation for the perpetration of a gigantic fraud upon the French people, only thirty-five days were spent in the field by these men and their engineers.

Wyse then sought a new concession, and this he obtained from the Government in Bogota in May, 1878. In the meantime the engineer Reclus went over the route, spending, however, but eighteen days in the field, when he returned to Europe and died.

And it was, Mr. President, upon this concession and this pretended survey, this palpably fraudulent foundation as a base, that the Panama Canal Company, the old one, was founded.

Up to this point in the history of affairs relating to an isthmian canal Ferdinand de Lesseps had been a "looker-on in Vienna," evidently awaiting the hour when he could best determine as to which of the school of promoters it would be to his interest to associate himself with, whether the Lefevre-Blanche combination, those interested in the Nicaragua route, or the Wyse-Tuerr combination in the Panama scheme.

At this time the Lefevre-Blanche people had a good route, via Nicaragua, thoroughly surveyed and mapped, but unfortunately had no concession from Nicaragua or Costa Rica, while the Wyse-Tuerr people had a concession, but they had no survey, but which route had been condemned by scores of American engineers after a most thorough and careful investigation. It was at this juncture De Lesseps became identified with the Panama scheme. He induced the Paris Geographical Society to call what he designated as "An International Scientific Congress." This congress convened and was called to order by De Lesseps in Paris, May 15, 1879. He organized the committees. What was known as the "technical committee," which had jurisdiction of the question of the selection of a route for an isthmian canal, was composed of 54 members; of this, but two were Americans, the leading American delegate being the American engineer Menocal, and the two leading English delegates were Sir John Hawkshaw and Sir John Stokes.

Mr. Menocal, one of the greatest naval, civil, and hydraulic engineers in America, and thoroughly conversant with the Panama route, through long personal experiences, presented and urged upon that committee of 54, at great length, the insurmountable difficulties in controlling the Chagres River.

This was shortly after he had made a thorough survey of the Panama route. He spoke of it as a river that has been known in the past to rise as high as 43 feet in twenty-four hours.

That is the character of a river you have to deal with, where you propose to construct the Bohio dam—a river which has been known to rise 43 feet in twenty-four hours and 46 feet in twice twenty-four hours. I will say that this is not my statement, but it is the report of the engineer of the Panama Railroad Company as to the rise in this river.

Mr. Menocal also urged in the Paris congress the feasibility and great advantages of the Nicaragua route. He was strongly supported in these views by the two leading English delegates I have just named. The only data Wyse could present to this committee as a foundation for consideration and action as to the Panama route was an old map made by Totten, the former chief engineer of the Panama Railroad Company, made in 1857, twenty-two years before the meeting of this international congress.

De Lesseps, however, controlling the committee as he controlled the congress—and why should he not control both, as they were both in a great measure his creatures?—demanded of this committee an answer to two questions:

First, whether a tide-water canal was possible across the Isthmus of Panama; and,

Second, whether it could be constructed along the Panama route.

And notwithstanding the gross absurdity of requiring answers to such questions with the meager data before them, in fact no data at all, that committee advised De Lesseps and his international congress that a tide-water canal was practicable, and that it should run on the Panama route between Colon and Panama.

Wyse's estimate of the total cost of constructing a sea-level canal, submitted by him to this committee, was 427,000,000 francs, or about $85,400,000. This technical committee, however, under De Lesseps's dictation, revised this estimate and increased it to 1,044,000,000 francs, or $208,000,000, or $37,200,000 more than double the Wyse estimate.

Was ever a more barefaced, transparent fraud enacted by any great committee, or any congress, either national or international?

But the absurdity of the whole proceeding is still further disclosed when it is recalled that before any vote was taken in this committee the American and English representatives had withdrawn in disgust, and that not more than 20 of this committee of 54 ever voted on any one of the propositions submitted; while, when a vote was taken in the full congress, only 98 out of 136 delegates voted, of these 75 voted in the affirmative, but of these 75 only 19 were engineers, and but a single one of the whole number had ever seen the Isthmus of Panama.

The enormity of this whole proceeding is still further developed by the fact that it is now conceded on all sides, with one exception, even by the French engineers, even by the new company now seeking to sell its plant to the United States for $40,000,000, that an isthmian sea-level canal across the Isthmus of Panama is a physical and engineering impossibility.

I say there is one exception, and that is the distinguished Senator from Ohio, who in his speech yesterday, as I understood him, claimed that a sea-level canal could be constructed there, or that a canal with locks, now recommended by this Commission, could be constructed, and that later on it could be reduced to a sea-level canal. I wish to say, without stopping to point to the testimony, that those Senators who feel interest enough in this matter to investigate it thoroughly will find that the testimony of all the engineers, both French and American, is to the effect that the construction of a sea-level canal across the Isthmus of Panama is an engineering impossibility.

Mr. MORGAN. And it has been abandoned expressly by the French.

Mr. MITCHELL. And as stated by the distinguished chairman of the committee, it has been abandoned expressly by the French company and the French engineers.

Mr. MORGAN. And by the Isthmian Canal Commission.

Mr. MITCHELL. And by the Isthmian Canal Commission also. Then what is the use, Mr. President, to indulge in loose talk here about doing this, that, or the other thing, however high may be the motive and however earnest may be the men and the Senators—and I do not question the motive of any man. Especially would I hesitate to question the motive of any Senator.

I take it we are all honest; we all mean to get at the truth here; but it is a misconception of the case on this particular point to say that the construction of a sea-level canal across the Isthmus of Panama is a possibility.

Mr. President, based on this exclusively paper basis, De Lesseps appealed, but in vain, to the people of France for subscriptions. He called for subscriptions for 800,000 shares of the nominal value of $100, and he pledged himself to proceed with the organization when one-half of the amount was subscribed for. In his appeal for subscriptions he represented the stockholders would receive dividends of 11¼ per cent, while he proposed to pay 5 per cent interest on all shares. But, notwithstanding these flattering inducements were backed up by the great name of De Lesseps, the French people declined to seize the apparently tempting bait, and the total subscriptions were less than 30,000,000 francs. Then it was that the ever resourceful De Lesseps, who until then had never set his foot on the Isthmus of Panama, determined to visit that country, and by a spectacular performance arouse the cupidity, fire the patriotism, and incite the ambition, not only of the French, but of the American people. His plans were international in their conception, and his great ulterior purpose the capture not only of the French, but of the American investors, and to obtain control not only of the French Parliament, of the French press, of the French politician and the French people, but also the American press, the American public, and, if possible, the Administration of President Hayes.

In pursuance of these great purposes, every one of which was characterized by mercenary motives, and not one of which was prompted by either national or international patriotism, nor by any desire or real intention of promoting the commercial welfare of nations, or of advancing the true interests of civilization and material progress by the construction of the canal, the great De Lesseps arrived in Colon, on the Isthmus of Panama, on the 31st day of December, 1879. It was his first visit there. His first alleged purpose was to verify the Reclus survey, which was, as I have already stated, really no survey at all. But even in advance of his arrival he announced to the world that ground would be broken and work on the Panama Canal would be commenced on the 1st day of January, 1880. And the proceedings which immediately followed his arrival at Colon—in fact, the very next day, January 1, 1880, the breaking of ground on the deck of a steamer, stuck in the mud 2 miles distant from the selected spot for breaking ground, and 2 miles distant from land—present one of the greatest farces, if not the very greatest, ever witnessed on earth in either ancient or modern times.

Although De Lesseps's own engineers had estimated the cost of a sea-level canal under the Wyse concessions at $208,800,000, he, while on his way to New York, after breaking ground, on the deck of a steamer 2 miles from land, reduced this estimate by lopping off at one stroke of his pen from the amount of the estimated cost of his own engineers the sum of $77,200,000—not francs, dollars—and fixing the amount at $131,600,000 instead of $208,800,000 as fixed by the engineers. Why, Mr. President, was this done? I will tell you why. It was because the Paris congress had estimated the cost of the canal on the Nicaragua route at $143,000,000. What a gigantic step of misrepresentation and false pretenses was this in the preparation for the launching of one of the most stupendous "gold brick" games ever imposed on any people.

But still fearing the French people might hesitate to subscribe on account of the amount required, even according to this reduced estimate, he again, in October of that same year, 1880, reduced the estimate by cutting off the further sum from the total of $25,600,000 and fixed the total cost of the construction and completion of the Panama Canal at $106,000,000. That is just a mere fraction over one-half of what his own engineers, the engineers of the great congress which he had called together, had fixed. Why was it done? Of course he was fearful that there would be another failure on the part of the French people to take stock on account of the magnitude of the sum that had to be raised, and therefore he reduced it, as I said, by a stroke of his pen, to one-half the amount; first lopping off while on the steamer on his way from Panama to New York $77,200,000, and in October of the same year he took his pen and lopped off $25,600,000 more.

Then, by this reduction in the estimated cost, and by proclaiming to the public that two well-known and distinguished contractors, Couvreux & Hersent, men who had successfully executed large contracts on the Suez Canal and in the public works on the Danube, were willing to enter into a contract to complete a sea-level canal at Panama for 512,000,000 francs, or $102,400,000, believing he had prepared such an attractive bait that the people of France would not hesitate to bite, he issued his proposals. This was in November, 1880; and this time, instead of asking for 400,000,000 francs, or $80,000,000, he only asked for 300,000,000 francs, or $60,000,000, thinking that the French peasants—men, women, and children—would more likely bite if the aggregate amount to be raised was not so large.

This proposition was accompanied with a proposition upon the part of De Lesseps, or the Panama Canal Company, which was the same thing, that the balance of $42,400,000 would be forthcoming from the sale of bonds of the company. It was subsequently proven, on investigations which followed, that the statement that the contractors Couvreux & Hersent would enter into a contract to construct the Panama Canal for a certain figure was without any foundation whatever and was a base misrepresentation.

This plan of De Lesseps and his associates for extracting money from the people of their own country, the most of them peasants and many of them women, was a grand success; and of the 600,000 shares to be disposed of at $100 each 10,000 shares of the same were set aside for the Wyse-Tuerr combination as a consideration for the Wyse concession. This left but 590,000 shares at $100 a share to be offered to subscribers. But so thoroughly had the plans of the conspirators been laid and in such an attractive manner had the scheme been presented that, instead of 590,000 shares, 1,206,609 shares were subscribed for. In the final allotment of the shares—because there had to be an allotment—the subscriptions were double in excess of the shares to be allotted, in the final allotment of the shares, to some more and to some less, there were allotted in all to 102,230 persons, over 16,000 of whom were women. Of the total number who obtained shares 80,837 had less than 5 shares each and 19,143 had less than 20 shares each.

On the first call a fraction over $25,000,000 in cash were collected. The conspirators were in funds. And when the first financial statement was submitted to the shareholders March 3, 1881, it was made to appear that within a fraction of $9,000,000 had vanished in what was termed in the statement as "preliminary expenses." This it must be borne in mind was all anterior to the date when a shovel of dirt had been thrown or a pick struck in the commencement of the work on the canal.

De Lesseps had while in America in 1880 done a little business on this side, in New York and elsewhere. Among other things, as will be remembered by all, he organized what was called the "American committee." Precisely what the duties of the American committee were, and just how far its jurisdiction extended, can not perhaps be accurately stated except by the committee itself.

That it was to a very large extent political there can be no doubt, and that one of its chief duties was to bolster and boom the Panama Canal scheme and to throw every obstruction in its power in the way of the construction of the Nicaragua Canal is equally true. Some idea may be had of its duties from two facts disclosed by the history of the rise and downfall of the Panama scheme. One is that it appears from this financial statement submitted to the shareholders, to which I have just alluded, that one of the items making up the $9,000,000 charged to the account of "preliminary expenses" before a shovel of ground had been turned was "$2,400,000 set aside for the American committee," and the other significant fact is to be found in the testimony of Charles Colne, general agent and secretary of the American committee, taken first in Washington before the Congressional committee, in 1893, and again before the Senate Committee on Interoceanic Canals, February 17, 1902, and in the report of Monchicourt, the Paris liquidator of the old company, to the judges of the civil tribunal of the Seine in 1890.

From both these sources it is made clear that the enormous sum of 12,000,000 francs, or $2,400,000, was paid by the De Lesseps combination, the old Panama Canal Company, to the American committee. That this was purely, solely, and emphatically a corruption fund in its most depraved and despicable sense is now, as it ever has been, evident to all. To tempt the cupidity of an aged and honored Cabinet member of the Hayes Administration, and if possible to bend that admirable Administration in the direction of their unholy purposes, a position as managing agent of the American committee, with an annual salary of $25,000, was held out as a bait, and which, unfortunately, proved too enticing even for that honored member of the Cabinet.

WE ARE INVITED BY THE SPOONER AMENDMENT TO PARTICIPATE IN A LOTTERY SCHEME.

I will say in this connection that we are invited, as it seems to me, Mr. President, by the Spooner amendment, and by the views of the minority of the committee, to participate in a lottery scheme, as I shall proceed to show.

The Nicaragua route should be selected, because the selection of the Panama route involves the necessity of buying out the New Panama Canal Company at the price of $40,000,000, and this involves the United States, indirectly, at least, just to what extent it is almost impossible to determine, in the old French lottery scheme of 1888, and I will tell you why.

On January 8, 1888, the French Parliament, at the solicitation of Ferdinand de Lesseps and his associates and as a last desperate effort to save from bankruptcy and utter ruin the Compagnie Universelle du Canal Interocéanique, the Old Panama Canal Company, enacted a law authorizing that company to engage in a lottery scheme; that law authorized that company to issue securities to the amount of 600,000,000 francs, payable with prizes by lot, with the following conditions. I quote from the French law.

First. The securities shall bear annual interest, the rate of which can not be less than 3 per cent on their par value.

Second. The total annual sum distributed in the form of prizes can not, in any case, exceed 1 per cent of the par value.

Third. The par value of the securities issued can not be less than 300 francs; subsequent division of the securities issued is forbidden.

Fourth. The payment of this loan in a period of ninety-nine years, at fartnest, shall be secured by a sufficient deposit, for this especial purpose, of French Government bonds or of securities guaranteed by the French Government. The Compagnie Universelle du Canal Interocéanique de Panama, to meet the obligations imposed upon it, is authorized to increase, under the same conditions, the said loan of six hundred millions, by the sum necessary for this guaranty fund, this increase of loan not to exceed 20 per cent of the par of the issue.

By article 2 of this act of June 8, 1888, it is provided as follows:

ARTICLE 2. If the Compagnie Universelle du Canal Interocéanique de Panama should hereafter convert all or any of its former obligations, the provisions of article 1 shall be applicable to the new securities created by means of this conversion.

While by article 3 of this act it was provided as follows:

ARTICLE 3. All material necessary for the completion of the works shall be manufactured in France. The raw materials must be of French origin.

Here again let me call your attention to a difficulty right at this point. The New Panama Canal Company, which succeeded to the rights of the old Panama Canal Company, rest in part for what they have to sell upon French legislation, and French legislation was to the effect that if that company constructed that canal all the raw materials used in its construction must be of French origin. Query: We become the successors in interest of the New Panama Canal Company, as the New Panama Canal Company became the successors in interest of the old company. If we go on and construct that canal, must we follow this legislation? We are bound by it, are we not? If we are not bound by it, our title is not good; and if we are bound by it, we are bound to go to France for all of the raw material with which to construct this canal. This is a pretty spectacle for the Senate of the United States to place before the people of this country, as it seems to me.

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator from Oregon will allow me to interrupt him one moment, I wish to state a fact.

Mr. MITCHELL. Certainly; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. MORGAN. As soon as that French law which the Senator has just read became public, a resolution was introduced into the Senate, was considered by the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported back by that committee unanimously, and passed by this body, I think, unanimously—I know there were not more than six votes against it—which declared that any interference on the part of any foreign government by its legislation or by any governmental act to assist in the building of a canal across the American isthmus would be resented by the United States. I will produce the resolution later, when I have the opportuuity.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am very much obliged to the Senator from Alabama, the chairman of the committee, for calling attention to this historical fact, which will appear, of course, in the records of the Senate.

Mr. President, a portion, not all, of these lottery securities were issued and disposed of by the old Panama Canal Company prior to its entering the regions of bankruptcy and the appointment of a liquidator or receiver. A large amount, however, of these securities remained on hand and undisposed of when that company became bankrupt, and on July 15, 1889—and I call special attention to this fact—the French Parliament passed another act, authorizing the sale of these lottery bonds then undisposed of at reduced rates. This act authorized the receiver of the old Panama Canal Company to—negotiate at any price, and without interest, such of the lottery bonds authorized by the law of June 8, 1888, as had not been placed or sold up to the 4th day of February, 1889, when the said company was dissolved and was turned over into the hands of a receiver.

It was further provided in this act as follows:

That the sums resulting from negotiation or sale of the said bonds shall be free from attachment or execution up to the amount of 34,000,000 francs.

And further:

In case the receiver should contribute or give to a company formed for the purpose of completing the canal all or a part of the assets of the receivership, the new company shall only have power to emit and issue bonds as yet unplaced or unsold by complying with the terms of the law of June 8, 1888, touching the minimum price of sale, and the distribution of interest.

Under this act the receiver of the old company, under the immense discretion given him by the terms of the act, sold large amounts of these old lottery bonds at 105 francs, the same to be redeemable at 400 francs. In support of this statement I quote from the testimony of Mr. Charles Colne, who was the general agent and secretary of the American committee, which committee was composed of J. & W. Seligman & Co., Messrs. Winslow, Lanier & Co., and Messrs. Drexel, Morgan & Co. This testimony was given before the Senate Committee on Interoceanic Canals on February 17 last.

The CHAIRMAN. Were you in Paris at any time during your agency for this company?

Mr. COLNE. I was there in 1889, sir; directly after the failure of the company.

The CHAIRMAN. Directly after the failure?

Mr. COLNE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. It was while you were there that your connection with the company terminated?

Mr. COLNE. No; it terminated here in New York, but I was sent over by an American syndicate to see if I could buy the Panama Railroad.

The CHAIRMAN. You went for the purpose of buying the railroad?

Mr. COLNE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. How much of the stock of the railroad company did the old Panama Canal Company own at the time you went over?

Mr. COLNE. Nearly every share, with the exception, I think, of a little over a thousand shares.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you buy the railroad or make a contract for it?

Mr. COLNE. No, sir; I could not. The Government came to the aid of the receiver and authorized him to sell some of the old bonds at 105 francs, redeemable at 400 francs.

The CHAIRMAN. What old bonds; the old bonds of the company?

Mr. COLNE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. How was he to sell them—at 105 francs, you say?

Mr. COLNE. At 105 francs. That was the sale price and they were to be redeemed at 400 francs.

That is the testimony of the agent of the American committee of the old Panama Company.

Senator KITTREDGE. Do you mean the lottery bonds?

Mr. COLNE. The lottery bonds, yes; and 60 francs of each subscription was held aside for a redemption fund, or the lottery fund. The receiver, Mr. Burnet, received actually in cash only 35 francs for each bond.

Senator KITTREDGE. What was the face value of these bonds?

Mr. COLNE. Four hundred francs.

Their face value was 400 francs, and they were sold at 105.

The CHAIRMAN. You say the Government came to the assistance of the company?

Mr. COLNE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. In what way—by an act of Assembly?

Mr. COLNE. By an act of the Assembly. Mr. Burnet first applied to the council of ministers, which is the first step to take. They refused him. Things were in a very critical state then. I got this directly from Mr. Burnet because in my negotiations with him he was very friendly and very pleasant. He applied to the council of ministers. They refused him, and as he had not any money at all, not a cent, he said to them substantially—

I call attention to this—

"Now, unless you grant me this authority I wish you to understand the elections are coming on, and I have got 800,000 subscribers, and you will hear from them." So subsequently, a few months after that—I think it was about a month after that—the authority was granted him. I will send you the prospectus of that loan.

The CHAIRMAN. What were the subscriptions of those people?

Mr. COLNE. Some of the old lottery bonds that were remaining in the treasury of the company.

The CHAIRMAN. There were not 800,000 of them, were there?

Mr. COLNE. The bonds that had been subscribed before were by 800,000 people.

The CHAIRMAN. You mean the bonds and the stock, do you not?

Mr. COLNE. All of it; yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The bonds, the stock, and the lottery bonds?

Mr. COLNE. The lottery bonds, the other bonds, and the stock.

Senator HANNA. Where did you get those figures?

Mr. COLNE. I got them from Mr. Burnet.

Senator HANNA. That is what he told you?

Mr. COLNE. Yes.

I have stated heretofore that the New Panama Canal Company is simply the old one in a new dress and under a new name. In corroboration of this let us inquire who compose the shareholders of the New Panama Canal Company? They are, in the main, the corporations, loan associations, administrators, contractors, and others, all of whom were connected in one way or another with the scandals of the old Panama Canal Company and all of whom profited through those scandals. The fact is, that pending a series of suits brought by the liquidator to compel these parties to disgorge, compromises were effected, the conditions of which were that the parties, respectively, being prosecuted should subscribe for stock in the new company, and the prosecutions against them, respectively, should be dismissed, and by this arrangement the 60,000,000 francs, being the original capital stock of the new company, were subscribed by these parties, as follows:

	Francs.
Eiffel, of Eiffel Tower fame	10,000,000
Crédit Lyonaise	4,000,000
Société Génerale	4,000,000
Crédit Industriel et Commercial	2,000,000
Administrators of the old Panama Canal Company	7,885,000
Artigue Sonderegger & Co	2,200,000
Bartoux, Litellier & Co	2,200,000
Jacob heirs	750,000
Convreux, Hersent & Co	500,000
Various persons to the number of 60 who had profited by syndicates created by the old company	3,235,700
Hugo Oberndorffer	3,800,000
By subscription	3,484,300
The liquidator or receiver of the old company	15,895,000

These several subscriptions made up the full amount of the original stock of the new company, namely 60,000,000 francs. These facts appear in the fourth report of the liquidator to the French court, dated November 26, 1895, pages 8, 9, and 13. That is a matter which I investigated personally when in Paris last summer; and all I say is confirmed by the records now before the Senate.

The old Panama Canal Company, between the date of its organization and the date of its downfall, February 4, 1889, issued and put on the market in all nine separate and distinct issues of bonds, amounting in the aggregate to 1,271,682,637.57 francs, or $254,336,527. Of these, two series were lottery bonds, one of 254,603,871.73 francs and the other of 68,732,694.95 francs. This does not include the sale of lottery bonds by the receiver of the old company, nor does it include any of the shares of stock issued at different times. According to the report of the Isthmian Canal Commission, the total receipts of the old company, including the amounts due up to date, June 1, 1890, was 1,329,693,078.74 francs. The securities, bonds, stocks, etc., issued by which this amount was realized had a total face value of $435,559,322.80. This is the report of the Commission, whose recent report we are considering.

Mr. MORGAN. Is that the amount of money that the old Panama Canal Company had to handle?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, sir.

But not only so. It is not only a fact that the present stockholders of the New Panama Canal Company, as I have stated, are composed of persons natural and artificial, all of whom were connected with the abominations of the old Panama Canal Company, most all of whom were not only prosecuted for corrupt practices, but many of them convicted, but there is a further significant fact, not to be lost sight of in determining the question as to whether it is wise upon the part of the United States to connect itself with this property by a purchase of the same from the new company at the price of $40,000,000, and that is this: According to the testimony taken by your committee, the old Panama Canal Company, through the liquidator, is to receive 60 per cent of the purchase price should a sale be made by the new company to the United States.

The liquidator represents the old company, its hundreds of thousands of shareholders and bondholders—lottery bonds and other bonds. Should the sale be made, a report on that sale must be made to the French court before whom all of these bankruptcy proceedings are still pending. Any one or any number of these shareholders and security holders of the old Panama Canal Company have a right under the laws of France to file his or her objections to the report. They may take the position, either individually or by any collective number, that the liquidator had no power or jurisdiction to enter into the agreement which it is said he did enter into and by which, in the event of a sale of the property, the shareholders, bondholders, and security holders were to receive but 60 per cent of the amount. The other 40 per cent, it is presumed, goes to the shareholders in the new company. It will be the duty of the court to investigate and pass upon these multitudinous questions, involving the rights of this vast number of shareholders and security holders, the power of the liquidator to enter into this contract, and, after the adjudication is made, it must be remembered this court in which these proceedings are pending is not a court of last resort, but an appeal lies from the decision to the court of ultimate resort in Paris.

It will be remembered by the terms of the transfer of the property of the old company to the new company, which took place in 1894, it was stipulated and agreed that the liquidator, for the benefit of the shareholders and bondholders of the old company, was to receive 60 per cent of the net profits arising from the construction of the canal by the new company; and one of the conditions of that transfer was, not that the new company should sell out the property either to the United States or to anyone else, but that the new company should proceed to complete the canal. This was the condition upon which the liquidator made this transfer; when subsequently, without the consent or authority of any of these shareholders or security holders, this arrangement is changed, recently, within the last year or so, by which the liquidator agrees to sell the property, no amount being stipulated by the French court or by the liquidator, either forty million or forty hundred million or any other amount, but simply that there might be a sale and that the liquidator should receive 60 per cent of the amount received on the sale.

In view of all these complications, in view of the fact that both the old canal company and the new canal company are still in the French courts, would any wise man in his senses risk the venture of investing $40,000,000 in a property whose title is so clouded in so many different respects? Our friends on the other side may answer, and do answer, by saying that if the Spooner amendment is adopted and the President can not obtain a satisfactory title that then the way is open to construct the Nicaragua Canal. But let me tell you, Mr. President, the place and time to determine whether it is wise to have anything or nothing to do with this Panama venture is here and now.

As bearing upon the questions to which I have just been attracting attention, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the testimony of Hon. Samuel Pasco, one of the members of the Isthmian Canal Commission, who, as stated very correctly in the views of the minority, was selected as a legal authority to be a member of that Commission, and who was recognized by the Commission as its legal adviser. In Mr. Pasco's testimony taken before the Senate Committee on Interoceanic Canals, February 11 last, he testified as follows:

Mr. FAIRBANKS. From what page of the record is the Senator reading?

Mr. MITCHELL. I really can not give the Senator the page now, as I am reading from copy; but the Senator will find it by turning to the testimony of Mr. Pasco before the committee. It is, I think, in part No. 1 of the hearings.

The CHAIRMAN. The obligation of the new company was to build the canal and to operate the canal. Now, this company proposes to sell to this Government all of the rights, privileges, and property which it acquired from the old company for $40,000,000. In the purchase of these rights of this property will not this Government assume all the obligations of the new company to the old company?

Mr. PASCO. No; they must be settled in the process of this transaction.

The CHAIRMAN. How would they be settled?

Mr. PASCO. They will be settled through the receiver, the receiver joining in the transaction, becoming a party to the sale and receiving the proceeds of whatever interest he has as a representative of the creditors and the stockholders of the old company. These proceeds will have, as I have stated, to take the place of the property itself and will be distributed under the order of the court, just as in a case of a legal sale in this country where there are a number of different liens and obligations against a piece of property—judgments, perhaps, and mortgages and liens of different characters, general creditors, and owners. The property is sold, the proceeds are paid into court, and then the proceeds are distributed under the order of the court. Then all the old claimants are eliminated. Settlement with them is made by the court. This is a kindred proceeding to that, according to my understanding.

The CHAIRMAN. The liquidator of the old company of course represents the stockholders and creditors, and in agreeing to this sale of course he is changing the whole nature and character of the contract with the new company originally assumed in the purchase?

Mr. PASCO. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, can the liquidator, regardless of the rights of the stockholders and creditors, enter into a contract with this Government or any other party by which the whole nature of the original contract is changed, and relieve the Government or the purchasing party of the obligations which the new company assumes toward the old company?

Mr. PASCO. I do not think he can of his own volition. I think he can submit the whole matter to the court under whose jurisdiction he is serving and acting.

Senator MITCHELL. At the time this original transfer was authorized by the liquidator—I mean the sale of the property of the old company to the new canal company—there was nothing in that transaction, was there, either directly or indirectly, which contemplated a sale of this property to the United States?

Mr. PASCO. No.

Senator MITCHELL. None at all. It was to be transferred and they were to get their share in the property. The transaction contemplated that the new company would go on and construct the canal?

Mr. PASCO. Yes, sir.

Senator MITCHELL. Now, Mr. Pasco, is it not a fact that the new company is now and always has been a solvent company?

Mr. PASCO. I so understand.

Senator MITCHELL. Has it not a large amount of money in the treasury now?

Mr. PASCO. I do not know how much.

Senator MITCHELL. Three or more million dollars?

Mr. PASCO. It has money in its treasury.

Senator MITCHELL. Was there ever a time since it was organized when it was not solvent?

Mr. PASCO. I understand it has always been solvent and is now.

Senator MITCHELL. Now, I would like you to explain, for my satisfaction, how a court in France obtains jurisdiction of this company so as to authorize it, a solvent company, which always has been solvent, to transfer all its property in violation of the existing agreement by which it was to go on and construct this canal. How does the French court get jurisdiction to do that thing?

Mr. PASCO. The company has the power to dissolve itself whenever the circumstances justify.

That was the only answer that Senator Pasco could make to that proposition.

Senator MORGAN. Under what law?

Mr. PASCO. Under its charter.

Senator MORGAN. You mean the statutes?

* * * * * * *

Senator MITCHELL. What is troubling me is this: Of course, I want to get at the facts at the bottom of all these legal difficulties, if there are any legal difficulties. Here is a company that is insolvent and is in court, and it owns certain property.

Mr. PASCO. Which company do you mean?

Senator MITCHELL. I mean the old company. The old company owns a certain amount of property.

Mr. PASCO. The liquidator of the old company owns it.

Senator MITCHELL. The liquidator or receiver under the order of the court is authorized, acting for the old company and for the stockholders, to sell all this property to another company, to an outsider, on certain terms and conditions, the terms being that the new company shall go on and build the canal.

Mr. PASCO. And the court considering at that time that it was a favorable agreement——

Senator MITCHELL. The old company, through the liquidator, as a consideration is to receive 60 per cent of the net profits that shall accrue by reason of the construction of the canal. Now, that contract is entered into. It is an accomplished fact. The title is vested in the new company, which is a solvent company. What is troubling me is this: How can the French court make an order that will authorize the new company to divert the whole business from that contemplated by the original arrangement and sell out the whole thing for a certain specific sum to the United States or somebody else, so as to bind in any manner, shape, or form the old company or individual stockholders? That is the question that is troubling me.

Mr. PASCO. At the time the order of sale was made that seemed to be the best use to which the property could be put. It was transferred to the new company with the understanding that the liquidator was to share in the rents, issues, and profits. But supposing a change takes place in the situation, and it is found that the original purpose can not be accomplished, and the court sees that it is to the better advantage of the stockholders and the creditors to have a final disposition made of the interests within its charge rather than to continue it under this former arrangement? Is it not within the power of the court to change the disposition of the property instead of continuing this use of it, to have it sold and divide the proceeds among the parties?

Senator MORGAN. You ask a question, and now I will be very much obliged to you if you will answer it.

Mr. PASCO. I say that was the action of the court. The court decided, in its judgment, that it is better that that arrangement be discontinued, and that a new agreement be made by which the property is to be sold, and all the parties interested in it are to be allowed to receive their proper share of the proceeds.

Senator MORGAN. Do you think that the court had that authority?

Mr. PASCO. I do.

Mr. President, I am not finding fault with anything Commissioner Pasco says here. He simply gives us his opinion, but that opinion leaves the whole matter in confusion and doubt.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Will my good friend allow me to ask him a question, simply to get at his view, without desiring in any way to interrupt him?

Mr. MITCHELL. Certainly.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I should like to ask the Senator if his position is that there is no power, in view of this contract made between the liquidator and the new company, for the sale of this Panama property either to the United States or to anybody else?

Mr. MITCHELL. I will say that I think, for that and other reasons, it is extremely doubtful, to say the least.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Doubtful whether they have the power now to sell to the United States or to anybody else?

Mr. MITCHELL. I think it is a question of very serious doubt, a question of very grave doubt, whether the New Panama Canal Company has, by anything or by all that has occurred since 1894, been released, so as to bind the shareholders and bondholders of the old company, from the obligation imposed on it in 1894, to go on, as one of the conditions on which it became the owner of the property, and complete the construction of the canal.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Although it is recognized by the parties interested in the property and by the entire world that the enterprise has not succeeded and is a dead failure in the hands of the present company?

Mr. MITCHELL. I think the fact whether it is a failure or not does not change the legal proposition at all; and all agree that it is a failure.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. By this agreement the stockholders and creditors of the old company will receive 60 per cent of the $40,000,000, but under your contention that there is no power in the new company to alienate the property and divest themselves of title they must lose it all?

Mr. MITCHELL. That is right in the event the new company fail to comply with its obligation of 1894 to go on and complete the canal; but I say further that, even admitting that legally they have the power to make a transfer, the question is still remaining in the French courts as to the distribution of the money, and we take the chances of the 60 per cent ever going to the liquidator, or to the men whom the liquidator represents. The shareholders have a right to contest all these things in the inferior court; the right of appeal exists, and controversies may, and will, as I think, be engendered there that will not be ended for years, and in the meantime it may result in stopping work on the canal.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. With the permission of my good friend, I wish to ask him one other question. Is not that a controversy over the fund solely, and having no relation to the corpus which we acquire by this purchase?

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not think so. I think if we buy this property we take it subject to every condition of the French law and to every condition attached by any decision of the French courts, and if it should turn out that we are not conforming to those conditions we are liable to get into very great difficulty.

Besides, the distinguished Senator from Indiana will bear in mind that it is agreed on all hands that the New Panama Canal Company is a solvent company with 16,000,000 francs in its treasury. It became the absolute owner of this property more than eight years ago. The title to the property then vested in this solvent company, subject to certain conditions, namely, that this new company should construct this canal and should pay to the liquidator 60 per cent of the net profits arising from the construction of the canal. I deny the right, therefore, the jurisdiction of the court to control this new solvent company by a new arrangement releasing this company from the duty of constructing the canal and authorizing it to sell and dispose of all its property as though it were a bankrupt concern.

As bearing upon the general subject under consideration, I may be permitted to quote the following letter from Hon. W. Lair Hill, who spent the greater part of last year in Nicaragua and who is one of the prominent lawyers of the Pacific coast. The letter was published in the Oakland Enquirer, Oakland, Cal., February 5 last, and is as follows:

OAKLAND, February 4, 1902.

EDITOR ENQUIRER: From a letter received by me a few days ago from a well known and prominent American now residing in Central America, and who years ago was domiciled for some years in Nicaragua, and afterwards for a time at Panama, I take the following paragraphs relative to the isthmian canal, which I think may be of interest to your readers:

"The Panama Frenchmen having dropped their price to $40,000,000, which the Commission considered their work worth, and the House having passed the Hepburn bill, upon the Senate is now placed the responsibility of more delay or legislation. The opponents of legislation will shout for Panama, hoping thereby to create a diversity of opinion between the House and the Senate, and thus prevent construction. * * * Even if the Panama work were offered us at $5,000,000 it is not desirable, being on the outside line and in so unhealthful a region that a canal there will cost thousands of lives and millions of dollars additional, with consequent delay in construction. Having lived on the Panama Isthmus a year I know what it is. The yellow fever and pernicious malaria are epidemic at Panama every season and unknown in Nicaragua.

"The Canal Commission were obliged to delay examination of the Panama Isthmus for some months, owing to prevalence of yellow fever there, but commenced at Nicaragua immediately after the bill was passed which enabled their appointment. The same old gang that created the odious Panama scandal at Paris, which sent several of the French 'corps legislatif' to prison (among them Charles De Lesseps for six years), others to compulsory exile, and poor old De Lesseps, sr., to a dishonored grave, are now trying to create at Washington a second Panama scandal to disgrace our Government as they did their own for their personal profit; and are aided by recreant Americans in their pay or interested with them from selfish motives."

That company, as matters now stand, has no power to give us a clear title. This of itself ought to end the matter; but in addition to all that, I believe the Nicaragua route is the proper place and the one that will be of the greatest benefit to commerce, and in every way better than the Panama route.

So it is seen that those who are best qualified to judge correctly are ranging themselves on the side of that route which opens the best prospects of advantage to American commerce and enterprise—the Nicaragua route.

Very respectfully,

W. LAIR HILL.

I also beg the attention of the Senate to the following letter from Martin Quinn, of Seattle, State of Washington, received by me in December last. Mr. Quinn is a prominent civil engineer of the Pacific Coast. The letter, written after five months' residence on the Isthmus for the purpose of investigating, speaks for itself.

SEATTLE, WASH., December 31, 1901.

Hon. JOHN H. MITCHELL,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: My motive must be my excuse for troubling you to read this letter. The press dispatches tell us that the Panama Canal Company offer the hoodooed ditch for $40,000,000. I was over the Nicaragua route three years ago, and after looking the country over very carefully, and making a five months' study of its possibilities, I am convinced that the United States would make a great error in adopting the Panama route, even if the same could be secured without cost.

My reasons for such belief are as follows: First. The Nicaragua route runs through a more healthy country than the other route.

Second. It is much better in point of saving time and distance between our Atlantic and Pacific ports.

Third. There is an abundance of fresh water, and this extends the entire length of the proposed canal.

Fourth. Five or six railroads will extend north and south from the canal into Costa Rica, Nicaragua, Honduras, and Salvador, penetrating a country of wonderful fertility, and with an aggregate population of perhaps 2,000,000 of people. The trade of this region would soon be ours, and we need it.

At the western entrance to the canal would spring into existence a city, which in ten years would have a population as large as San Francisco. This is no dream, when we remember that there is no land-protected harbor from Acupulco to Guayaquil. This would be an American city, with proper sanitary laws and arrangements, such as no city in Central America, Mexico, or northern South America at present possesses.

Fifth. Lake Nicaragua, with its surface area of 2,600 square miles, would be an ideal rendezvous for our Navy. A fresh-water anchorage would be a most desirable thing, particularly so when so centrally located in a part of the world where our interests are so great and increasing with every year that passes.

The Panama has no such country in its immediate vicinity as the Nicaragua has. The adoption of the latter means an immediate demand for American rails and rolling stock in great quantities and the Americanization of Costa Rica and Nicaragua in ten years. It would be a great thing for America commercially and a good thing politically for the Republican party.

Yours, very respectfully,

MARTIN QUINN,
818 Second Avenue, Seattle, Wash.

I submit, enough has been shown in the record in this case, and now before the Senate, to cause a halt upon the part of Senators urging the adoption of the Spooner amendment.

Diplomatically a conclusion may be reached that we can obtain a satisfactory title—that is, one satisfactory to diplomats—to the property in question, and based on such a decision the President may proceed to expend $40,000,000 in the purchase of the property. And yet, notwithstanding all this, away off and beyond it all, there may be, and unquestionably will be, innumerable claims, based upon alleged equities that will not be cut off and with which the United States will be compelled to contend for an unlimited number of years.

According to the testimony of Mr. Charles Colne, the secretary and manager of the American committee of the old company, there are to-day 800,000 people interested in one way and another as shareholders or security holders of the old and new companies. This will appear from his testimony, page 216, as follows:

Senator HAWLEY. About how many claimants are there in France? How many people have stock or obligations of any kind that have been made as claims against this company in case it goes on and builds a canal?
Mr. COLNE. About 800,000 subscribers.
Senator HAWLEY. About 800,000 people?
Mr. COLNE. Yes.

THE VIEWS OF THE MINORITY.

In the additional views of the minority of the Senate Committee on Interoceanic Canals, presented to the Senate on May 31 last, and in connection with which they propose as a substitute for the pending bill what is known as the "Spooner amendment," the minority say:

The substitute which we advise insures an isthmian canal and, in our judgment, more surely, satisfactorily, and speedily than by any other plan.

This of course is undoubtedly the sincere judgment and conviction of the minority. But if I desired to defeat absolutely any legislation at this time looking to the early construction of an isthmian canal, I do not know of any better method I should adopt than to support the proposed substitute.

The minority of the committee in their views submitted May 31, while insisting strenuously that Congress should be guided by the report of the Isthmian Canal Commission, insist that the Nicaragua route is so liable to be disturbed by earthquakes and volcanoes that Congress should not, for this reason alone, adopt that route, and the minority enter into an extended argument in which they contrast the seismic disturbances of the two routes to the great disadvantage, according to their views, of the Nicaragua route.

Now, Mr. President, permit me to quote from the report of the Isthmian Canal Commission submitted to the President May 9, 1899, in which in discussing the subject of earthquakes and volcanoes the Commission say this:

From the most reliable data obtainable the Commission believe that the Nicaragua route is practically exempt from any seismic influence of sufficient force to cause destruction or danger to any part of the canal route or suspension of its traffic. Dr. C. W. Hayes has treated this question fully in his report. He says:

"Earthquakes due to dislocation of strata (faults) are perhaps no more liable to occur in the vicinity of the Nicaragua route than elsewhere, and hence they do not constitute a danger which is peculiar to this region more than to almost any other in which a ship canal might be constructed."

He then proceeds to discuss those due to volcanic agencies at some length, but concludes that these activities are on the wane and so remote from the route as not to constitute a menace. In quoting from Major Dutton, he adds:

"Briefly, then, the risk of serious injury by earthquakes to the construction proposed for the Pacific section of the canal is so small that it ought to be neglected * * * also that the risks on the Atlantic section are still smaller than those of the Pacific section."

While the Commission in their final report, that is, the one submitted to the President November 16, 1901, in speaking of the subject of earthquakes, reiterate these views in still stronger terms, as I have already pointed out.

THE REASONS GIVEN BY THE ISTHMIAN CANAL COMMISSION FOR THE CHANGE FROM THEIR RECOMMENDATION OF THE NICARAGUA ROUTE, IN THEIR FINAL REPORT, TO THE RECOMMENDATION OF THE PANAMA ROUTE IN THEIR SUPPLEMENTAL REPORT, ARE WHOLLY INADEQUATE.

It is perfectly apparent to all that the change of the recommendation of the Isthmian Canal Commission from the Nicaragua to that of the Panama route is based purely and solely on what they conceive to be a saving in the expense of the construction of the canal of the amount of $5,630,704.

In other words, the sum and substance, free from all minor and unimportant considerations, of the reports of the Isthmian Canal Commission is this:

We for many reasons—commercially, military, hygienic, seismic, and otherwise—believe the Nicaragua route to be the better route for an isthmian canal, and we so report and recommend. But inasmuch as the construction of the canal over the Panama route, which commercially, military, hygienic, seismic, and otherwise we believe to be inferior to the Nicaragua route, can be constructed for $5,630,704 less than the other, therefore we, in our final supplemental report, recommend that route.

Can it be possible that the Senate of the United States, in a great international enterprise like this, costing nearly $200,000,000, and which is intended for all time to vitally promote and, in short, revolutionize for the better, the commerce of the world by uniting by a gigantic artificial ship channel the two great oceans of the world, will permit this comparatively paltry difference in the cost of construction, this mere bagatelle compared with the magnitude of the enterprise and of its cost, to control its action to the extent of setting aside the better route and accepting an inferior and for many reasons objectionable route? The Isthmian Canal Commission must furnish me with a better reason than this before they can expect me to reject and set aside their recommendations in their report of November 16, 1901, wherein, at page 263, they said this:

After considering all the facts developed by the investigations made by the Commission and the actual situation as it now stands and having in view the terms offered by the New Panama Canal Company, this Commission is of the opinion that "the most practicable and feasible route" for an isthmian canal to be "under the control, management, and ownership of the United States" is that known as the Nicaragua route.

Mr. President, there is danger in delay; there is a great commercial loss in delay. The best of the world's economists estimate the earnings of the world's commerce to be $1,200,000,000 annually, and if an isthmian canal will save but one-fifth of the time and distance, it would represent about $250,000,000 annually, so, as stated by one of the members of the Isthmian Canal Commission, while this question is held in abeyance, awaiting the decision as to routes and policies, the commerce of the world is subjected to this enormous and useless waste, which would be sufficient to build the canal each year.

But to recur again to the history and frauds of the old company, in the meantime work was commenced on the canal and for a time carried on with some show of good faith. De Lesseps again, in 1886, went to the Isthmus, returning only with new devices and new schemes looking to the extraction of more money by the million from the French people and the French Government. On his return to France he publicly proclaimed that "most of the work was done," and announced the canal would be completed within three years from that time, but these statements were coupled with the further statement that more money must be raised.

Then it was that the great lottery scheme was resorted to. Application was made to the French Parliament by the Panama Canal Company, the real title of which was Compagnie Universelle du Canal Interocéanique, but now generally understood as and called the "Old Panama Canal Company," for permission to issue a loan of 600,000,000 francs ($120,000,000) with lottery prizes. The scheme failed in 1886, but two years later it was made a success by means of the most stupendous system of corruption of public men and of the press the history of the world has ever known. On the failure of the passage of the lottery bill through the French Parliament in 1886 De Lesseps withdrew his application and obtained permission from the stockholders to issue a new series of bonds. This was a success, and many million more francs passed from the pockets of the French peasants to the treasury of the old Panama Canal Company. Millions of these bonds are still outstanding, unredeemed, in the hands of the French people.

But although the lottery loan was authorized, subscriptions to that loan failed to materialize, and the necessary amount of $120,000,000, this being the amount—although it was many million dollars less than the amount actually necessary for the completion of the canal—with which De Lesseps declared he could complete the canal in three years, was not subscribed for. Two million of these lottery bonds were issued, the nominal value of each being 360 francs, bearing interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum, all of these being payable at 400 francs each by a civil amortization association and sharing in the semimonthy drawings; but of these 2,000,000 lottery bonds issued only 800,000 were subscribed for.

The failure to float this loan marked the downfall of the old Panama Canal Company, and following speedily in the wake of this downfall came parliamentary and judicial investigations and trials and the opening of prison doors to the promoters of the most detestible and stupendous fraud of either ancient or modern times. The parliamentary and judicial investigations which followed in the wake of this appalling and apparently irresistible avalanche of corruption developed the startling and almost incomprehensible fact that more than 436,000,000 francs, or about $86,800,000, had been expended in promotion and corruption, to say nothing of the further facts disclosed by these investigations and prosecutions, that four contractors alone had realized net profits on their contracts of a fraction over 75,000,000 francs, or about $15,000,000.

Such a boodle fund as that, more than $90,000,000 in gold, would, in comparison, render insignificant, infinitesimal, and a mere bagatelle the largest corruption fund ever raised for any corrupt purpose by the most depraved people of the most debased age in the world's history.

Before this fearful ingulfing flood French cabinet ministers, senators, deputies, scientists, statesmen, bankers, financiers, politicians, and journalists went down in one damning whirlpool to irretrievable political and moral death.

Standing on the verge of the grave, the great engineer, Ferdinand De Lesseps, tottering under the weight of more than eighty years, together with his son, Charles De Lesseps, were convicted and sentenced each to pay a fine of 3,000 francs and to be imprisoned for five years.

Here are some of the names of eminent men who fell before the temptation placed before them. I read from the very carefully prepared magazine article of Mr. Rawson Bennett, published in January last, in which the history of these investigations and trials is accurately stated. He says:

Mr. Louis Andrieux, formerly prefect of police, on December 22, appeared before the committee of inquiry. He produced a photograph of a memorandum made by Reinach of sums paid to deputies, senators, and ministers.

The original list was in the possession of Cornelius Herz, then a fugitive in England. Among the entries on this roll of infamy were the following:

	Francs.
To Floquet, minister of the interior and premier, "for political purposes."	250,000
To Floquet	20,000
To Barbe, minister of agriculture	550,000
To Rouvier, minister of finance and premier	40,000
To Rouvier, again	40,000

To Arene, Deves, Albert Grevy, Jules Roche, Proust, Beral, and Thevenet, 20,000 francs each.

To Fauconnerie and Renault, 25,000 francs each.

Distributed by Arton among 104 deputies 1,350,000 francs.

Mr. Bennett, proceeding further in his article, says:

On January 10, 1893, the two De Lesseps, Fontane, Cottu, and Eiffel were brought to trial. Ferdinand De Lesseps was physically and mentally unable to appear in person, having fallen into a state of imbecility that continued until his death. Charles De Lesseps took upon himself the whole responsibility. He admitted he had submitted to the extortions of Reinach, Baihaut, and other blackmailers, permitted the fictitious syndicates under cover of which they worked, and connived at the bribery of the press and corruption of senators and deputies. He related in detail the promotive operation of the Panama Company. Some of the most striking passages of his testimony follow:

"After the first subscription failed we were told that my father's name was not enough—that we must have the support of MM. Levy Cremieux, of the International Bank; Girardin, Genty, and Giblat, the Petit Journal (the most widely circulated French paper), the Semaine Financière, and the chief Paris and provincial papers. All this was to cost 800,000 francs. Reinach finally succeeded Cremieux as chief financier. We were flooded with offers of help—demands for blackmail—and being unable to judge of them I left that task to Reinach. I took care not to ask him what he did with the money. Nearly all the papers were holding out their hands."

What a comparison is this with the American press, where a journal is seldom known to have yielded to improper influences.

I considered it necessary at any price to finish the canal. Reinach asked for ten or twelve million francs for "publicity" and was given five millions. Half a million was given to Herz. Everybody knows what his influence was. In 1886, when we were applying for the lottery loan bill, M. Baihaut, minister of public works, asked me for a million francs, one installment to be paid when the bill was introduced, and the second when it passed. As it did not pass I gave him only 375,000 francs.

A pretty good price simply for introducing the bill.

Arthur Meyer, editor of the Gaulois, was given 100,000 francs for that paper's support.

Marius Fontane, formerly secretary of the Suez Company, and holding the same post in the Panama until 1886, when he became director and F. de Lesseps's private secretary, admitted paying 1,362,000 francs ($272,400) to the press in 1882 for favorable notices.

A pretty good press contract.

Among the subsidized papers was the Télégraphe, of which Minister De Freycinet was chief owner.

Gustave Eiffel admitted paying Senator Hebrard, principal proprietor of the Temps, 1,750,000 francs, or $350,000. He wrote to Hebrard: "I reserve you 5 per cent commission, and you and your friend will be good enough to continue your support." Eiffel also admitted that his profits from the Panama machinery contract were 33,000,000 francs ($6,600,000), and that he had received 12,000,000 francs ($240,000) for materials worth but 2,000,000 francs (or $40,000), and 6,000,000 francs ($120,000) for transportation of machinery never delivered at all. It was afterwards shown that Eiffel had divided 13,000,000 francs ($2,600,000) of his profits in "commissions" with various politicians, financiers, and journalists in a position to hurt or help the Panama scheme.

Mr. Bennett, proceeding further in his magazine article, says:

On March 8 the accused legislators were called for trial. Charles De Lesseps repeated his previous testimony and added some details as to his dealings with Reinach, Herz, and Arton. Minister De Freycinet had sent for him and advised him to do what he could for Reinach. Clemenceau and Floquet had made similar demands in behalf of Reinach and Herz. "It was not to my interest to fall out with the Government," commented De Lesseps, "and I did what I could for Reinach." Then Arton had asked for 300,000 francs for Floquet with which to fight the Boulangists in the Nord election, and an account was opened with Arton, ostensibly as a bond broker, but really to supply him with the funds to bribe deputies. De Lesseps also detailed anew his bribery of Minister Baihut, with whom arrangements were made through Fontane and Blondin, a clerk at the Crédit Lyonnais.

Mr. Bennett continues further, as follows:

March 10, 1893.—On this day was seen the memorable spectacle of a former minister of France, a man for years in public life, and a grandfather, standing up in open court and confessing his betrayal of his trust. Charles Baihut, minister of public works in 1886, who had sent Engineer Rousseau to Panama to learn the truth for the public benefit, confessed that he had suppressed Rousseau's report and used his official position to hold up the loan bill until bribed to introduce it. "I must have been mad," he said; "but I kept hearing how this one and that one was growing rich out of Panama, and they said to me, 'You are a fool if you do not get at least a million.'" He denied making the first demand to be bribed, and insisted that Charles De Lesseps, through Blondin, had first "offered to compensate him."

He publicly confessed receiving 375,000 francs for introducing the loan bill, of which Blondin took 70,000 francs as his "commission," and that he had stipulated for the rest of 1,000,000 francs when the bill was passed, and threw himself upon the mercy of the court.

Following Baihut's confession came the denials and excuses of the others accused. Ex-Deputy Sans Leroy admitted his sudden change of front on the loan bill of 1888, after making the acquaintance of Arton, and that he had soon after paid off about 200,000 francs of debts and mortgages, but he coolly defied the prosecutor to prove that this money came from Arton.

Senator Beral admitted receiving 40,000 francs from Reinach, but insisted it was for his "services as an engineer to certain mining companies in which Reinach was interested."

Deputy Fauconnerie admitted receiving 25,000 francs, but said it was given him out of "personal kindness" because of his losses in an earlier speculation, unconnected with Panama, into which Reinach had led him.

Ex-Deputy Gobron admitted receiving 20,000 francs, but said it was in payment for shares in a tannery company which Reinach had bought.

Deputy Proust insisted that his 20,000 francs was merely his legitimate profits from a syndicate in which he was with Reinach.

One and all denied that these operations, these "kindnesses," had in any way influenced their votes in Parliament.

Then came the excuses and explanations of the ex ministers. Floquet denied sending to De Lesseps for 300,000 francs for use in the Nord election, but admitted learning that the Panama Company was threatened with lawsuits, and advising De Lesseps to avoid them.

De Freycinet admitted counseling De Lesseps to avoid a lawsuit threatened by Reinach, as the scandal caused by this would be very detrimental to the public welfare. De Lesseps replied that the counsels of Floquet and De Freycinet had induced him to give Reinach 5,000,000 francs, as it was "not to his interest to fall out with the Government."

Mr. Bennett in his magazine article continues as follows:

In this connection a list, very incomplete, of the journals and editors accused of accepting Panama money to deceive the public, is of interest. Here are some of them:

The Petit Journal, 300,000 francs or $60,000, at the organization of the company and large sums afterwards.

The Télégraphe, Minister De Freycinet's paper, 120,000 francs or $24,000.

Jezlenski, director of the Telegraphe, 120,000 francs or $24,000.

The Gaulois, 150,000 francs or $30,000.

Arthur Meyer, editor of the Gaulois, according to Charles de Lesseps, 100,000 francs or $20,000; according to evidence found by the liquidator, 300,000 francs or $60,000.

The Radical, 100,000 francs or $20,000.

Senator Magnier, as director of Evenement, 50,000 francs or $10,000.

M. Patinot, director of the Journal des Batz, 40,000 francs or $8,000. Judging the fervor and ingenuity in falsehood of Paul Boiteau's articles in this paper some one must have got a great deal more.

Senator Hebard, director of the Temps, according to Eiffel, 1,750,000 francs, or $325,000, and also 5 per cent commission on Eiffel's contracts.

Paul de Cassagnac, of the Aurorite, according to his own confession, 45,000 francs, or $9,000; according to others, 63,000 francs, or $12,760.

Mr. Bennett, proceeding further, says:

From the foregoing, it is tolerably apparent what the old Panama Canal Company did and did not do with the millions it extracted from the pockets of the French people. From the report made by Liquidator Monchicourt, during the trial of the directors, on January 11, 1893, some interesting details are obtainable. They are shown in the following condensed balance sheet:

Cash actually received from the organization of the company until its suspension	1,434,000,000 francs, or	$286,400,000
Disbursements:
Expenses of management	199,000,000 francs. or	30,800,000
Interest of loans	249,000,000 francs, or	49,800,000
For labor on the canal	107,000,000 francs, or	21,400,000
Paid to contractors	443,000,000 francs, or	88,600,000
Total nominally legitimate disbursements	998,000,000 francs, or	199,600,000
Balance for promotion and corruption	436,000,000 francs, or	86,800,000

To the corruption fund must be added at least one-third, taking Eiffel's testimony as a basis, of the 77,000,000 francs, or $15,400,000, profits which M. Monchicourt found that only four contractors had made. Hence the total amount spent for deception of the public and corruption of the press and of legislators was not far from $92,000,000, a "boodle fund" unequaled in history.

Mr. Bennett concludes as follows:

When the old Panama Canal Company collapsed it owed its shareholders and bondholders over $400,000,000. It had received over $286,000,000 in cash. The value of the actual canal digging done by both the old and new companies is liberally estimated by the Walker Commission at not more than $27,500,000. The existing plant is probably worth $5,500,000 more. The Panama Railway is worth nearly $7,000,000 more, but for that the Frenchmen deserve no credit. They found it there and merely kept it going. Thus, the net results of the French efforts at Panama is work worth about $33,000,000—less than one-third of the boodle fund—provided somebody can be induced to finish the job, and otherwise worth absolutely nothing.

Such is the Panama Canal as it was and is—conceived in fraud, born in deception, nourished in iniquity, living on lies and corruption, perishing of its own rottenness; ruining the fortunes and lives of thousands, bringing infamy to practically every man who even remotely approached it; nearly causing the patriotic Frenchmen to despair of the Republic; becoming a standing argument against the democratic principle and representative government, and still filling the world with the stench of its corrupt life and loathsome death.

This is the sewer the American people are asked to clean; this is the moral swamp they are asked to drain, and to whose dangers they are asked to expose their public men, and their whole citizenship. And for whose benefit? That a few speculative Frenchmen may sell their damaged merchandise, and a few of their American hirelings may earn the wages of shame. For that reason alone are the American people asked to risk the enormous physical loss and expose themselves to the certainty of moral defilement. For the solemn fact is that the Panama can not be touched with favor by capitalist, by investor, by promoter, by journalist, or by statesman without certainty of deadly moral infection. All the waters of the multitudinous seas can not wash Panama clean nor all the winds of heaven blow away its deadly miasmas. It is simply too rotten to be touched without defilement or even to be looked at without nausea.

Such are the facts about Panama and these facts it behooves every American public man, every American journalist—yes, every American citizen—carefully to consider. When he considers them fairly and honestly, with due regard to his country's welfare, political and moral, he can reach but one conclusion. Panama can not be touched with safety by the American people. It must be shunned as a place incurably affected with the most deadly moral plagues. It must remain what it was and is—a perpetual monument to human credulity and human villiany—a dung heap of crime and a sink of iniquity wherein no nation can delve without certainty of irremediable pollution.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I desire to occupy a small amount of time in addressing the Senate upon the subject now before it. It is so late in the afternoon that I believe I would rather go on upon Monday.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. With the Senator's permission, I will make a motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HARRIS. I yield for that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, June 9, 1902, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate June 7, 1902.

POSTMASTERS.

Leander H. Miner, to be postmaster at Ferndale, in the county of Humboldt and State of California, in place of Leander H. Miner. Incumbent's commission expired June 3, 1902.

John Haig, to be postmaster at Le Roy, in the county of McLean and State of Illinois, in place of George Riddle. Incumbent's commission expired January 10, 1902.

Lon G. Hardin, to be postmaster at Ames, in the county of Story and State of Iowa, in place of Lon G. Hardin. Incumbent's commission expired March 9, 1902.

John D. Paddock, to be postmaster at Malvern, in the county of Mills and State of Iowa, in place of John D. Paddock. Incumbent's commission expired March 9, 1902.

William B. Arbuckle, to be postmaster at Villisca, in the county of Montgomery and State of Iowa, in place of William B. Arbuckle. Incumbent's commission expired February 25, 1902.

Cyrus McNeely Scott, to be postmaster at Arkansas City, in the county of Cowley and State of Kansas, in place of Richard C. Howard. Incumbent's commission expires July 1, 1902.

George T. Boon, to be postmaster at Chetopa, in the county of Labette and State of Kansas, in place of Joseph Craft. Incumbent's commission expired May 5, 1902.

Mark Swedberg, to be postmaster at Luverne, in the county of Rock and State of Minnesota, in place of Mark Swedberg. Incumbent's commission expired May 16, 1902.

Frank McCartney, to be postmaster at Nebraska City, in the county of Otoe and State of Nebraska, in place of Frank E. Helvey. Incumbent's commission expired March 31, 1902.

Chester H. Smith, to be postmaster at Plattsmouth, in the county of Cass and State of Nebraska, in place of Chester H. Smith. Incumbent's commission expired May 5, 1902.

Orange L. Bantz, to be postmaster at Humboldt, in the county of Richardson and State of Nebraska, in place of Orange L. Bantz. Incumbent's commission expired March 22, 1902.

George L. Davis, to be postmaster at Fonda, in the county of Montgomery and State of New York, in place of George L. Davis. Incumbent's commission expires June 13, 1902.

Edgar S. Clock, to be postmaster at Islip, in the county of Suffolk and State of New York, in place of Warren F. Clock. Incumbent's commission expires June 14, 1902.

James T. Pickering, to be postmaster at Lancaster, in the county of Fairfield and State of Ohio, in place of James T. Pickering. Incumbent's commission expires June 15, 1902.

Tulley McKinney, to be postmaster at Mechanicsburg, in the county of Champaign and State of Ohio, in place of Tulley McKinney. Incumbent's commission expired May 27, 1902.

Harriet F. Gault, to be postmaster at Media, in the county of Delaware and State of Pennsylvania, in place of Harriet F. Gault. Incumbent's commission expires June 10, 1902.

Francis M. Barton, to be postmaster at Terrell, in the county of Kaufman and State of Texas, in place of Francis M. Barton. Incumbent's commission expired May 24, 1902.

John M. Sloan, to be postmaster at Chase City, in the county of Mecklenburg and State of Virginia, in place of John M. Sloan. Incumbent's commission expired May 5, 1902.

Champ T. Barksdale, to be postmaster at Danville, in the county of Pittsylvania and State of Virginia, in place of Champ T. Barksdale. Incumbent's commission expires June 15, 1902.

James M. Vernon, to be postmaster at Everett, in the county of Snohomish and State of Washington, in place of James M. Vernon. Incumbent's commission expired June 3, 1902.

Rollin C. Lybrand, to be postmaster at Richland Center, in the county of Richland and State of Wisconsin, in place of Rollin C. Lybrand. Incumbent's commission expired January 12, 1902.

Logan G. Hysmith, to be postmaster at Wilburton, in the Choctaw Nation, Ind. T., in place of Millard F. Campbell, deceased.

Addison H. Frizzell, to be postmaster at Groveton, in the county of Coos and State of New Hampshire, in place of Napoleon B. Perkins, resigned.

R. P. Campbell, to be postmaster at Aberdeen, in the county of Chehalis and State of Washington, in place of Charles R. Bell, removed.

Harvey Springer, to be postmaster at Cambria, in the county of Weston and State of Wyoming, in place of John M. Righter, resigned.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate June 7, 1902.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, June 7, 1902.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR PUBLIC BUILDINGS IN SUNDRY CIVIL BILL.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to pass the concurrent resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the sundry civil appropriation bill (H. R. 13123) are authorized to consider and recommend the inclusion in said bill of necessary appropriations to carry out the several objects authorized in the "act to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, and for other purposes," approved June 6, 1902.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I ask the gentleman from New York to withhold his objection.

Mr. SULZER. I will withhold it, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I would like to have the gentleman from Illinois state the object of this resolution. As I understand, it is to provide that the appropriation required under the act providing for public buildings may be included in the sundry civil bill. As I understand, if they are not put in there, under the law and under the custom they will have to be included in the general deficiency bill. I would like to hear the gentleman on that point.

Mr. CANNON. The sundry civil bill, under the rules and practice, is a bill that carries appropriations of this kind. Since the bill went to conference, however, gentlemen are aware that the omnibus public building bill has become a law. Now, then, this concurrent resolution, if it passes both Houses, authorizes the conference committee to consider and insert necessary appropriations to carry out that law. If it should not be so treated, then, if the point of order was made, as I understand the practice of the House, it will require a special rule to include those items on the deficiency bill. The normal place is to treat of it in the sundry civil bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I would like to ask the gentleman, if this resolution passes, if it is the object or if it will give any privilege to exclude from either the general deficiency or the sundry civil the amounts that are authorized under the omnibus bill for public buildings already passed?

Mr. CANNON. I will say, to speak for myself, that in my judgment the public service in connection with the new legislation should be provided for. It is a continuing appropriation. I have already made inquiry, and it will take, from my standpoint, something over $6,000,000 that can be expended until the adjournment of the next session of Congress. From my standpoint and as one of the conferees I should insist on each and every item being cared for as the law provides.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. And there will be no more opportunity to exclude from the sundry civil bill the amounts authorized than there would be from the general deficiency bill?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The object of putting them in the sundry civil bill is not to get rid of any of them?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no.

Mr. BARTLETT. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question.

Mr. CANNON. Very well; I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman says that the amounts proposed to be put in the sundry civil bill as the result of the public building omnibus bill would amount to seven or eight millions.

Mr. CANNON. Between six and seven millions would care for the public service until Congress could again appropriate. I will say that I am informed by those who have examined the omnibus bill that it provides the contract system for various authorizations, but sites are to be bought, and that money ought to be provided for at once. The sites must be obtained before they can begin to make their plans. Now, I have already caused inquiries to be made at the Supervising Architect's Office, and have already consulted with the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. MERCER], chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings, and I will say that in my judgment it will be necessary to have somewhere between six and seven million dollars, which will be recommended in the conference report if the House conferees have their way. There is no disposition to fail to appropriate a single dollar that ought to be expended, this being a continuing appropriation and available until expended from the passage of the bill. Nor is there any disposition to put in anything that is not needed.

Mr. BARTLETT. The reason of my inquiry, if the gentleman will permit me, is, speaking for myself, a matter in which I am somewhat interested. There is existing law for the public building at Macon, but the omnibus public building bill contains an item that adds to the appropriation. The act of 1899 specifically appropriated the amount provided for to be expended there. The act which passed the House, known as the omnibus public building bill, increases the amount. Now, what I wanted to know was whether the committee of conference between the House and the Senate would be given the privilege to select what particular buildings should be provided for?

Mr. CANNON. Let me answer my friend on the exact point that he puts where the limit is broken or increased. The question would be asked of the Supervising Architect how much money is required under the new legislation to provide for the service of that construction until the 4th day of March next, and when he gives his answer, then, as one of the members of the conference, if this resolution is passed, that would be written in, if it was within my power. Of course it is in the power of the House, when it comes back, to reject the whole report.

The object is simply to give, in good faith, so far as I am concerned or have reason to believe, the amounts necessary on all these items.

Mr. BARTLETT. Then if this resolution be adopted we shall simply provide in the sundry civil bill for what the committee or the Supervising Architect may deem necessary in order that the improvement or construction of buildings may proceed until the 4th of March next, so that the Appropriations Committee at the next session of Congress would be called upon to supply simply the amount up to the limit fixed by Congress.

Mr. CANNON. Yes; in the event that the full amount has not been appropriated Congress would have an opportunity to give the full amount in the next year's bill. Under the law these appropriations are continuing and go into effect the moment the bill becomes a law. In this respect they are not like other appropriations that have to wait until the beginning of the next fiscal year.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none.

Mr. MERCER. The intention of this concurrent resolution is simply to provide appropriations when they may be needed by the Government as the work progresses?

Mr. CANNON. Precisely.

The question being taken, the resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. CANNON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted was laid on the table.

KATHERINE RAINS PAUL.

Mr. BROMWELL. I desire to call up the report of the committee of conference on the bill (H. R. 11249) granting an increase of pension to Katherine Rains Paul. The report and statement have been published in the RECORD. I ask that the statement only be read.

The SPEAKER. In the absence of objection the reading of the report will be dispensed with and the statement of the House conferees read.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement of the House conferees as published in the House proceedings of June 6.

The report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. BROMWELL, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to was laid on the table.

FRANCES L. ACKLEY.

Mr. RUMPLE. I call up for present consideration the report of the conference committee on the bill (H. R. 9290) granting a pension to Frances L. Ackley. As the report and statement have been published in the RECORD, I ask that only the statement be now read.

The SPEAKER. In the absence of objection, that course will be pursued.

The statement of the House conferees as published in the House proceedings of June 5 was read.

The report was agreed to.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

By unanimous consent, the bill (S. 3292) granting an increase of pension to Henry Loor Reger (heretofore referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions) was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PROTECTION OF THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. RAY of New York. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the bill (S. 3653) for the protection of the President of the United States, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union (Mr. GROSVENOR in the chair) and resumed the consideration of Senate bill 3653.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "Presidency" in line 6, page 4, insert "or any judge of the Supreme Court of the United States."

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I have heretofore expressed my disapproval of certain features of this bill. I believe that the words used in the first provision of the bill, "knowingly, unlawfully, and purposely," are not apt or properly qualifying words to describe a capital offense, and that the descriptive words of the common law should have been used by the committee in this bill. I believe, further, that this bill is a distinct invasion of the reserved powers and jurisdiction of the States of the American Union and that at least one State has amply demonstrated that State law and State judges and States juries can swiftly and condignly punish the assassination of a President of the United States.

But I know, Mr. Chairman, that my views on this question are not in accord with the views of the majority: and while I adhere to my opinion, yet I am willing to think that I may be wrong, and that this bill is drawn upon correct lines; and if the bill is drawn upon correct lines, it appears to me that the amendment I have offered is not only a proper one for the sake of uniformity in legislation, but one that ought, in common justice, to be adopted by this committee.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I take it that the lives of the members of the Supreme Court of the United States are at least equally valuable and sacred as the lives of Cabinet ministers and foreign ambassadors accredited to this Government. Indeed, I should imagine, Mr. Chairman, that the killing of a judge of the Supreme Court on account of an opinion delivered in a litigated case or for any official act was in a great degree more atrocious than the killing of a Cabinet officer, for it is a deadly blow, aimed at the very foundations of government itself.

Again, the Cabinet officer is an appointed officer, holding his office during the will of the Executive, whereas a member of the Supreme Court is a constitutional officer, representing in his great office the judicial arm of government. Again, so far as a Cabinet officer is concerned, his duties and his powers are insignificant as compared to the great responsibilities of a judge of the Supreme Court and the vast sweep of powers of the Supreme Court of the United States. If it shall be said, in answer to the amendment which I have offered, that the scope and purpose of this bill is to preserve the Presidential succession, then I desire to say that that answer is not an answer to the validity and the justice of this amendment, but I deny that that is the only purpose and scope of the bill. In section 3, as I now recall it, there is a provision which makes it a death penalty to kill an ambassador or a minister resident here and accredited by a foreign government to the Government of the United States, and I repeat it that the life of a Supreme Court judge, representing the majesty of the law, is of so great importance to the Government of the United States that we should not neglect to put him on the same plane and give him the same protection we accord Cabinet officers, ministers, and ambassadors.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I suppose that there is no member of this House who from friendly relations with President McKinley during the last three years of his life entertained kindlier feelings toward him personally nor lost more for himself and his constituents by the tragic death of the late President than did I. He was personally kind and gentle to me as to all others, and many times I had occasion to rejoice at his goodness of heart and personal kindness to me as well as fairness to my constituents. He was a man of good impulses, and made the best President his party leaders and party exigencies would allow him to make. I would yield to no man in disposition to cherish kindly sentiments for his memory or to cast flowers upon his grave, but, Mr. Chairman, if it is proposed to erect a legislative monument to his memory, I would prefer to have that enactment a wise and statesmanlike one that would reflect credit upon him as well as the Congress which enacted it.

I do not consider that it would be a fitting monument to him nor to any other man to legislate in a direction either of destroying State power or impairing the dignity, power, and efficiency of the General Government by burdening it down with things which are totally unnecessary to impose upon it, and which were foreign to the purposes of the great and wise statesmen who conceived and put into operation this great dual system of government in the land of the free and the home of the brave. [Applause.] The Federal Government may punish all crimes where it has exclusive jurisdiction. The States may punish all crimes in their territory, except such as are directly connected with the practical operations of the General Government, such as those which affect the revenues, the mails, etc. No matter which authority is exercising jurisdiction within its proper respective limits, it should legislate alike for all persons, preserving the principle of equality before the law. There is no "divinity that doth hedge about a king" in this great country. The office of President, as all other offices, confers great privilege and honor devoutly desired by a great many people, who are willing to take it, cum onere, enjoying its salary, its perquisites, and its honors with all its dangers and liabilities.

A man by assuming office does not lose his personality and equality with all the other citizens of the United States, and I shall never vote for a statute so violative of every principle and tradition of our history and people and subversive of the basic principles of our governmental system. [Applause.] As to the other features of the bill, Mr. Chairman, I might not oppose all of them, if properly framed and incorporated in our immigration laws. This bill appears to me more like the inconsiderate outcome of hysteria, which naturally results from abhorrent crimes, rather than the product of cool deliberation and the triumph of wise statesmanship. If there is a State in this Union which has been derelict in providing alike for the prompt and certain punishment of crimes against high and low, rich and poor, official and private, in degree and severity commensurate with the act committed, the proper authority to supply the remedy is the legislature of that State, and to such legislature I refer this question. The disposition to centralize all powers of government and place upon the central authority the entire burden not only invades the rights of the States, but wrongfully assigns to the General Government more duties than it can well perform. The distribution of powers and duties among the local communities is a salutary division of labor and responsibility, which contributes to dispatch, efficiency, and justice. It is wrong to burden the General Government beyond its capacity; it is wrong to deprive the States of their authority; but the gravest result is the injury to the people, whose lives, safety, liberties, and property are jeopardized by impairing the efficiency of administration.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, only a word in regard to this amendment. I desire to say that the committee thoroughly canvassed the question of going beyond the Executive there in line of succession to the Presidency in making provisions of this character, and the committee was unanimous that it would be unwise. If we go beyond the Executive, then there is no place to stop, and I hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I will ask to have read:

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 4, lines 6, 7, and 8, strike out "while he is engaged in the performance of his official duties, or because of his official character or because of any of his official acts or omissions."

Mr. PARKER. I will ask the Clerk to read the section as it would be if so amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

So that the section will read: "That any person who unlawfully, purposely, and knowingly kills the Vice-President of the United States or any officer of the United States entitled by law to succeed to the Presidency shall suffer death."

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, the committee will bear me out that I am not one of those who wish to repeat what has been decided by the committee, nor to reargue what has already been decided, but it strikes me that the Vice-President and those who are standing in succession to the Presidency, the Vice-President especially, are standing in a very different position from that occupied by the President. We fairly presume that the President is always engaged in his official duties.

The Vice-President, on the other hand, has no official duty except to preside over the Senate. Except when he is sitting in that chair—or if you hold the session of the Senate to be the term of his engagement, except during the session of Congress—he has no official duties whatsoever. During the recess he is not protected by that law. Nor are his official actions of such a nature as could be objected to. His sole official action in the Senate is to rule upon what comes up there, and that ruling is subject to instant reversal by the Senate itself. The object of this section is not, as I submit to the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, to protect his ability to rule on motions in the Senate. The object is shown in the words of the section to be to protect the succession to the Presidency. It is directed to those entitled by law to that succession.

Now, the Vice-President may have large public influence, and we have had Vice-Presidents who had such public influence. Imagine a case, during a recess of Congress, in which a disappointed office seeker, who complains of the Vice-President for using or not using his influence, kills him unlawfully, willfully, and maliciously. This section would then do nothing for the punishment of the offense or the protection of the Government. Many other cases may be suggested. The nation's interest in the Vice-Presidency is not in the fact that the Vice-President is President of the Senate. It is because he is the spare pilot standing ready to take the place of the pilot at the wheel of the ship of state and because the nation for its own protection has the right to protect his life. I urge upon this committee that it is constitutional to protect the Government, the nation, the Constitution from change of the succession to the office of its Chief Executive by such willful, knowing, and unlawful assassination, from whatever unlawful motive. This I believe to be the object of this section, and it is with a view of effectuating the object of the committee upon which I have the honor to have a place that, with all deference, I offer this amendment, one that stands, I believe, on stronger ground even than that offered in the case of the President.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, in opposing this all I need to say is that it is the same proposition that we fought over yesterday, only in this instance the Attorney-General of the United States substantially concedes that these limitations are necessary. In a bill which we had prepared in that Department and which we had before the committee, these limitations in effect are included, and no one, so far as I know, except the gentleman from New Jersey, has ever contended that you could protect the Vice-President under all conditions and circumstances. Now, we have had a test vote on this and there was a decided majority. I do not think I ought to take time in rediscussing the question and in thrashing over old straw. I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER], to amend section 2.

The question being taken, the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. PARKER. I should like a division.

The committee divided, and there were—ayes 15.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire a count of the noes?

Mr. PARKER. I do not.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out of section 2 all thereof after the "who" in the first line and insert, "willfully and with malice aforethought kills the Vice-President of the United States while he is engaged in the performance of his official duties or because of his official character or because of any of his official acts or omissions shall suffer death."

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is of the same character as the one that I offered to section 1, with the addition that it strikes out all the Cabinet officers. If it were adopted, this section would apply solely to the Vice-President, leaving out Cabinet officers. Now, I want to say to the members of the committee that we ought to be entirely deliberate and cool about this matter. I want the members of this committee to remember that when a man is appointed to a Cabinet position he does not lose the weaknesses that flesh is heir to. He is as likely to do wrong then as he was before he was appointed to that position; and if down in your State he should offer some insult to one of your citizens, and that citizen in the heat of passion should slay him, under this bill he would be liable to the death penalty.

I do not believe we ought to provide as severe a punishment as that would be under circumstances of that kind. Let us do what is right. Let us legislate like reasonable and intelligent gentlemen. Let us take into consideration the passions to which men are subject. While we throw around the President and these high officials that degree of protection that, it seems to me, will under all circumstances fully protect them against violence at the hands of bad people, we ought to have some consideration for our fellow-men who are so unfortunate as not to be able to restrain themselves when smarting under an insult given. All men are not forbearing, and there are many who, when excited, act hastily and without thought.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, I want the committee to understand that the gentleman proposes to strike out all of section 2 that would afford protection to the Cabinet officers of the United States. By law they are the persons in line of succession to the high office of the Presidency in case the President and Vice-President both pass away. I submit that we ought to retain that protection for the Executive and for those in line of succession. I hope the amendment will be voted down without taking further time,

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Chairman, we can not hear one word that is being said. Nobody knows whether the gentleman from New York is for the amendment or against it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is opposed to the amendment.

Mr. RAY of New York. I oppose the amendment, I will say to the gentleman, because I think that the purpose of our legislation is and ought to be to protect the President, the Vice-President, and those officers of the Government now designated by law to fill that high office in case a vacancy occurs.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. This amendment defeats that purpose.

Mr. RAY of New York. And this amendment defeats that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out the words "or any officer of the United States entitled by law to succeed to the Presidency."

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, that amendment, if adopted, would confine this legislation to the President and Vice-President.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will remind the gentleman from Missouri that the House has twice voted against sustaining an amendment of that kind to the bill.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I think not in reference to this motion.

Mr. McCULLOCH. The amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky was "maliciously, etc."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will not make the point of order now.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I would like to understand about that. I think there has been no vote upon that proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The identical proposition has been twice voted upon by the House on this bill in the same language.

Mr. DE ARMOND. A proposition of this kind?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks to the first and second sections.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Not about this.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee and the gentleman from New Jersey offered an amendment to strike this language out of the second section.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Can not we have order? We can not hear.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey offered an amendment to strike from the second section of the bill "while engaged in the performance of his official duties or because of his official character or because of any of his official acts or omissions."

Mr. DE ARMOND. That is not what I offer, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair stands corrected. The amendment does differ from the others.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I thought it had not been voted on.

The amendment if adopted would leave the act to apply wholly to the President and Vice-President, where I believe it ought to be left. Now, I do not desire to take the time of the committee upon it, because everybody has presumably made up his mind on the subject, and the matter is easily presented to the mind of anyone. It will be noticed that an offense which would be nothing more than manslaughter, the punishment for which under the law of no State in the Union, under no law of the Federal Government, would be death—for such an offense the punishment prescribed here is death.

The succession of a Cabinet officer to the Presidency must be remote, highly remote. There has never been a succession in the history of the country beyond the Vice-President. The second person who can succeed to the Presidency, in the case of the death or the incapacity of both the President and Vice-President, has never yet been called to the Presidency. With these facts of our history before us, with the other fact that we are preparing to punish in a way that the crime would not be punished under any law of the United States or any law of any State, the act ought to stop, in my judgment, with the President and the Vice-President. The existing laws provide amply now for punishing the murder of a Cabinet officer or any other assault upon him in protecting all the individuals of the country. If the offense were to take place where the jurisdiction of the United States is exclusive, there are ample Federal laws for the protection of the officer as an individual, and for the punishment of the offender. If the offense be committed in a State, the State laws are ample.

I think it ought not to be that. if a Cabinet officer, the seventh or eighth from the Presidency, if you please, were to be the victim of assault in a State, or if he were to suffer death in a State, when that offense would amount under the State law or national law as they now are to nothing more than manslaughter, we make it murder. We ought not by this law to provide that the Federal court shall have jurisdiction in a State of an offender guilty of nothing but manslaughter, grave and serious as that offense may be, but not so serious as murder, and that he shall by Federal law be punished as for murder. I have stated the sole object and purpose of the amendment, and with these remarks I submit it to the committee.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, just one word. The amendment proposed by my colleague on the committee is identical with that offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH], with the exception that the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky included the striking out of the words "the Vice-President."

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. No; mine included the striking out of the words "unlawfully, purposely, and knowingly," and inserting "willfully and with malice aforethought."

Mr. RAY of New York. Very good. I want to say that our purpose is, and we think we have the right, to protect the President and Vice-President and those officers in line of succession to the Presidency under the law as it exists, and we ought to do that; and I think there is no question but that we have the constitutional right to do it. No one questions that except the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS]. I trust the committee will insist on voting down the amendment and retaining the protection for all these officers who are in line of succession to the office of Chief Executive of the nation.

Mr. BELLAMY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman's amendment is not in order.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman be allowed five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the request of the gentleman from Kentucky will be granted.

There was no objection.

Mr. BELLAMY. Mr. Chairman, I am much interested in this discussion, and I think the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH] ought to have passed, but not having passed, I think the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] ought then to be adopted.

The same reason does not apply to extending protection to the members of the Cabinet that do to the protection of the President. In fact, I can conceive of instances where in the social relations of life a member of the Cabinet may be visiting and in a sudden broil or heat of passion may get into some difficulty and he may be slain because of some discussion about his duties, although he may be the aggressor, and the slayer, while technically guilty of manslaughter, would be actually punishable by the death penalty under this provision. This is not right, and not in accord with the true spirit of the American Republic, composed of States whose laws and institutions are based on common-law principles.

I do not think it is the intent or the desire of the country at large to throw such a protection around Cabinet officers, and the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky ought to have prevailed, because the principle of malice, "with malice aforethought," as expressed in the law, ought to enter into the crime, so far as it relates to the members of the Cabinet, because they are, as I say, brought into daily contact with various people that the President and the Vice-President will not be.

I hope this amendment will prevail. The country at large is not demanding more effective protection of the individual with reference to the President and the Vice-President. They are demanding that laws shall be passed stamping out anarchy in this country. The law is already sufficient to punish any criminal who assaults the President of the United States, but we wish to make more effective the suppression of these individuals and the exclusion from this country of anarchists and nihilists who come here with an utter disregard for government, and exclude or deport them, if necessary, and that is, if I understand aright the trend of the public mind, the popular demand throughout the country, and not more effective laws for the prosecution of the individual. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. DE ARMOND) there were—ayes 49, noes 61.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Let us have tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chairman appointed as tellers Mr. RAY of New York and Mr. DE ARMOND.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 58, noes 67.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out the words "and knowingly" in line 4, page 4.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, all penal laws are to be strictly construed. It does not require a strict construction of this bill as it now stands to hold that in order to convict any person of the offense here defined it must be first shown that he knew that he was killing the officer designated, the Vice-President of the United States, also that he knew that that officer was at the time engaged in the performance of an official act. The committee in its report say, "There is no question as to the power of Congress to define and punish the offense of unjustifiably assaulting or killing the President while engaged in the performance of his official duties."

If that be so, what is the necessity of inserting the word "knowingly?" The same principle would apply to section 2, referring to the President. And over on page 23 of its printed report the committee apparently so construes it that in order to commit the offense punishable by this act the offender must know that he is killing the officer named in the bill, and he must know that at the time of the killing he was engaged in performing an official act.

If that is not to be its effect, then the word "knowingly" can have no purpose or necessity in the bill. I think the same words should have been stricken out in the preceding section in reference to the President. I shall ask at the proper time unanimous consent to refer back to the first section and strike it out there, if this amendment prevails. I do not believe, many leading lawyers in this House do not believe, the Senate does not believe, the people of the United States do not believe, and the Supreme Court will never decide that in order to make it constitutionally an offense punishable by death it is necessary to prove that the person who kills the President of the United States knew at the time he was President, and not only that, but knew that he was at the time engaged in the performance of an official act.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, we have thrashed that over once in discussing the preceding section. These words, as I stated, were taken from the bill drawn in the office of the Attorney-General. They have no such meaning as the gentleman from Pennsylvania would impute to them. They mean that the criminal must "unlawfully and purposely" kill, and that he must know that he is killing. To say that he must know the official character of the person assailed or must know that the person killed is engaged in the performance of official duties is a strained construction, not a legitimate one. I hope that the opinion of the law officer of the Government as to the propriety of the words will prevail. The committee was unanimous in agreeing that the construction stated is the proper construction of these words.

Mr. OLMSTED. May I ask whether the use of the word "knowingly" is necessary at all?

Mr. RAY of New York. Oh, certainly, if we would make the bill efficient and certain.

Mr. OLMSTED. If we say that the person must "unlawfully and purposely kill," is not that language sufficient?

Mr. RAY of New York. No. In the criminal law, as we found after thorough investigation, the two words have a somewhat different meaning. Putting them together they have a broader meaning than standing alone. When the bill suggested at the Department of Justice came to me, my first impression was that the language was objectionable as tautologous; but on looking up the meaning of the two words in the law, I found that in order to cover the case properly both ought to be used, and we therefore retained them, and to be consistent we ought to retain them.

Mr. OLMSTED. Does the gentleman understand that the word "knowingly" implies that the assailant must know that the person assailed is the President of the United States.

Mr. RAY of New York. I do not; that is not the meaning.

Mr. OLMSTED. What must he know?

Mr. RAY of New York. He must know that he is killing some one, or doing an act that may result in the death of some human being.

Mr. OLMSTED. Czolgosz, when he shot President McKinley, did not know that he was killing him, for his victim did not die until some time afterwards.

Mr. RAY of New York. He did not know that he had actually killed him; but that is not the idea. He knew that he was trying to kill somebody; he knew that he was striking a blow that might be fatal; he knew what he was doing, and intended death. If the assailant or the person striking the blow is a lunatic or an idiot, every lawyer knows that in the eye of the law the act is not knowingly done. If the assailant be a lunatic or an idiot, this word would exclude him. The word is necessary, so as to not punish a man improperly.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. If the word "knowingly" be used, will it not be necessary, in order to render the assailant guilty, that he shall know he is killing the President, or some person in the line of Presidential succession?

Mr. RAY of New York. It does not make any difference whether he knows his victim is engaged in the performance of official duty or not. It does not make any difference whether he knows that he is assailing a particular officer or not. He takes the chances. If he kills a man purposely, and that man is the President engaged in his duties, he is guilty.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. I believe that this House has voted upon these propositions believing that the word "knowingly" refers to the mental status of the assailant; that this is an anti-anarchist bill, and that when a person kills the President or a Cabinet officer in the line of succession, knowing that the person assailed is such officer, then he is guilty of a capital offense. Now, the gentleman from New York, as I understand, construes the word "knowingly" to refer only to the act, so that a man would be guilty under this provision whether he knew or not that the person he killed was the President or the Vice-President or a Cabinet officer.

Mr. OLMSTED. The report, on page 23, states that in order that this offense of "knowingly" killing the President may be committed the assailant must have knowledge that the person assailed is an officer engaged in the discharge of his duty, "for he knowingly kills an officer charged with the execution of the law while in the discharge of that duty."

That is the language of the report, and it is perfectly plain that the word "knowingly," as used in this bill, bears that construction.

Mr. RAY of New York. Used in the connection intended, the words would have the construction which I give them.

Mr. CLARK. I want to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question. He has just read some language from the report and says it is "perfectly plain." "Perfectly plain" as meaning what? Does it mean that the assailant must simply know that he is killing somebody, or does it mean that he must know the man he is killing is the President?

Mr. OLMSTED. As I understand, he must know that the man he is killing is President and must know also that he is at the time engaged in the performance of some official act.

Mr. CLARK. Then he will know a good deal more than some people in this House would know.

Mr. RAY of New York. When the gentleman from Pennsylvania uses the words "official act" he does not draw the distinction that has been drawn by the Supreme Court of the United States. A man is engaged in the performance of an official act, like the members of Congress on duty to-day. Now, to-day we are each engaged at this time in the performance of an official act. When this House adjourns and we go down to our dinners to-night we are engaged in the performance of our official duties, as this bill provides, but not in the performance of an official act. I call for a vote.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amendment be again read. Many of us did not hear it.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion is to strike out the word "knowingly" in the fourth line of the fourth page. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken, and the amendment rejected.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment, which I will submit and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after section 2 the following as an independent section:
"That any person who unlawfully, purposely, and knowingly kills the President-elect or the Vice-President-elect of the United States shall suffer death."

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, is that in order?

The CHAIRMAN. It depends upon the question whether there are any further amendments to section 2 to be offered. If not, then the amendment is in order.

Mr. RAY of New York. Very good.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana will be considered.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, have we left section 2?

The CHAIRMAN. We have completed section 2.

Mr. LANHAM. I wish to make a motion in regard to that section.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

Mr. LANHAM. I move to strike out all of section 2, and I just wish to say one word. I do not now remember to have heard of the Vice-President of the United States being assaulted or of any attempt made to kill him because of the possibility that he might become President. Ordinarily, when a citizen reaches that high station, he is regarded, I believe, as being laid upon the political shelf, and I never have heard of any Cabinet officer being assaulted because of the remote contingency that he might at some time become President of the United States.

Mr. WARNOCK. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, I would like to inquire if he has forgotten the attempt that was made upon Vice-President Johnson at the time that Lincoln was shot, and upon Mr. Seward as well?

Mr. LANHAM. That had escaped my recollection.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, but at that time the Cabinet officers could not succeed.

Mr. LANHAM. The situation was very different then from what it is now in a time of profound peace.

Mr. BARTLETT. Cabinet officers at that time could not succeed to the Presidency.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. But the Vice-President could.

Mr. LANHAM. I move to strike out the whole section.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the motion was lost.

A division was demanded by Mr. LANHAM.

The House divided, and 20 members voted in the affirmative.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I do not demand a further count.

So the motion was lost.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will again report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after section 2 the following as an independent section:

"That any person who unlawfully, purposely, and knowingly kills the President-elect or the Vice-President-elect of the United States shall suffer death."

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, it seems to be the purpose of Congress to assert the Federal power in the protection of the President of the United States and those in the lawful line of succession. Heretofore the Federal Government has depended upon the incidental protection that came from the enforcement of State laws. There is abundant authority in the Constitution for Congress to protect its own officers. It has been settled beyond question that the Federal Government is not compelled to depend upon any other sovereignty for its own protection; it has inherent and express power enough to take care of itself and preserve its own political integrity.

Now, when one is elected President of the United States by the electors that are regularly chosen he is given a constitutional status, and more embarrassment, I submit, may come to the people of the country in the overturning of popular government from the assassination of the President and Vice-President elect than can come even from the assassination of the President and Vice-President after they have been inaugurated, because Congress has provided abundantly for the succession in the event of the death or resignation or removal of the President, but I submit there is no adequate provision for succession of one who has been elected President of the United States and has not yet been inaugurated.

This Government is a government of the people. It is based upon popular elections, and it goes to great pains in surrounding the institution of elections with safeguards to protect their purity and integrity, to prevent and punish fraud and imposition, and it is utterly preposterous, in my judgment, to say that the Government that may exercise all of this authority, these incidental powers, in preserving a great fundamental principle upon which the Republic rests, and yet has not the power to go further and protect to the people of the country the result of the election, after the electors have assembled and elected the Chief Magistrate of the country. If he shall be assassinated, murdered, say, in the State of New York, it is not only a crime against the State of New York, but it is a crime against the State of Indiana, against the State of Ohio, the State of California, the State of Texas, because by that crime the people in all the States in this country have been deprived of the services of one whom they selected to be the Chief Magistrate.

The result of popular elections would be overthrown. It is a blow at the very vital principle of republican government, and I submit again that the embarrassments that must come from a crime of that kind under those circumstances, may be infinitely worse than any crime that could be inflicted upon the Federal Government by the assassination of a President. What would be done if, after the electors had met and chosen a President of the United States and exhausted their power, the President-elect and Vice-President-elect should be assassinated? What constitutional resource would the people have? The term of the incumbent expires on the 4th of March under the Constitution, and, as I understand it, all of the Cabinet officials who are appointed and who are members of his official family, go out of official existence with him. An interregnum, if I may be allowed to use that term in connection with the politics of this country, might easily happen, and in view of the heat that may be engendered in Presidential elections, in view of the party feeling that may be worked up over the fierce contests that occur every four years, some disordered mind might be prompted to assassinate the successful candidate.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, all I need to say in reply to the gentleman is that his proposed amendment is clearly unconstitutional, unauthorized by the Constitution beyond any peradventure. It is decided over and over again that the President, the Vice-President, and many other officers elected to represent the Government are mere private citizens until the 4th of March comes. In the case of the United States v. Cruikshank, and in numerous other cases, it is held that sovereignty for the protection of the rights of life and personal liberty of the citizens within the respective States rests alone with the States. I will not read any more, but that principle is iterated and reiterated, and Congress has not any power to enact such a law as this for the protection of a citizen of the United States, it makes no difference to what high office he has been elected, until his term of office begins.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. RAY of New York. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Is it not a part of the duty of the incumbent who is President, in the execution of the laws of the United States, to see to it that the President-elect is not obstructed in his inauguration and in taking his seat?

Mr. RAY of New York. Oh, it would be the duty of the President in executing the law to preserve order at the inauguration of his successor.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Very well; that is what I am getting at.

Mr. RAY of New York. But that would be to preserve the public peace in the District of Columbia, which is entirely within the jurisdiction of the United States. And another thing; the 4th of March has come, the time has come when the President comes into office, and he becomes President whether he takes the oath or not.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Now, I want to ask this question: Does not this bill rest entirely for its constitutional warrant upon the proposition that Congress is given power to execute the foregoing grants of power? In other words, do we not derive our right to pass the very bill that we are passing here from the right that is given to Congress to enforce and execute the provisions of the Constitution?

Mr. RAY of New York. Oh, incidentally, that is one of the grounds, certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Is not that the only ground really, because we have the right to say that a governmental agent of the United States is obstructed by killing or otherwise in the discharge of his duties?

Mr. RAY of New York. That is the ground.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. That grows out of the constitutional power to enforce the foregoing provisions which have conferred certain powers and duties on certain executive officers. Now, if it be true that it is the duty of the incumbent of the office of President to see to it that the incoming President is safely inaugurated without obstruction, then have we not the same constitutional warrant for the other?

Mr. RAY of New York. To provide for the punishment of the man who kills the President-elect?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. RAY of New York. Clearly not, Mr. Chairman, because the President-elect is a private citizen until the 4th day of March comes, until the hour of noon arrives, and Congress can not protect him until then. When that hour comes he becomes the President of the United States. Of course it may be the duty of the incumbent to protect me as a private citizen, but that does not give the Congress power to enact special laws for my protection, and making my murder in a State as a private citizen such an offense as is contemplated in this bill.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. RAY of New York. Yes.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. Why not add to the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] a suggestion such as you have in section 13, that the President-elect shall be presumed to be in the performance of his duty from the time he is elected? [Laughter.]

Mr. RAY of New York. Well, that is mere nonsense, and I will not take any time to answer it.

I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] to insert a new section, which the Clerk will report for the information of the committee.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. THOMAS of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not in order. The amendment pending is already an amendment to an amendment.

Mr. THOMAS of Iowa. This is a new section, as I understand it.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana is an amendment to a pending amendment. The question is on the motion to amend.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Let us have a division.

The committee divided, and there were 22 in the affirmative.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I withdraw the request for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. The noes have it, and the amendment to the amendment is rejected.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. Before leaving section 2, I want to offer this as a proviso.

The CHAIRMAN. We have left that section. The Chair asked if there were any other amendments to section 2, and there were none offered.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. Then I offer it as a new section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee proposes an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add after second section:

"Provided, however, That no person shall suffer the death penalty for this act unless he knew the official character of the officer killed."

Mr. RAY of New York. I make the point of order against that. I confess, Mr. Chairman, that I have not heard it distinctly. May I ask to have it again reported?

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. RAY of New York. I make the point that that is simply a proviso to section 2, and that it is not a new section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not decide that it is a proviso.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. I would like to have order just one moment, because this is a most important measure. I offer this amendment on account of the construction placed upon the word "knowingly" by the distinguished chairman of the Judiciary Committee. He says that the word "knowingly" in this bill referes to the act and not to the mental status of the assailant of the President. Now, I take it, Mr. Chairman, that we are legislating here not for the hour, not for the day, but for all time; and I want to say I believe it is a monstrous and bloody proposition to say that any man should suffer death under circumstances of this character unless he knew the official character of the person whom he killed. Now, what is the scope and purpose of this bill? This bill is aimed primarily at anarchy and anarchists, who are opposed to all officials and who have a hatred against organized government. Now, you have a proposition in this bill making a penalty of death to kill a man knowingly, unlawfully, and purposely, when this man does not know that he is killing an officer.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. TAWNEY. Under this amendment all a man would have to do in order to be acquitted would be to plead that he did not know that he had killed an officer.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. I refer my friend to the common law, and also tell him that the State would be able to punish, and would punish such a man. If he killed a Cabinet officer or any other officer, then he would be amenable to the jurisdiction of the State court, and that is a complete answer to that question. He would be punished for his crime.

Now, I want the chairman of the Judiciary Committee and the committee itself to put itself on record on this amendment, by saying that it proposes to visit the extreme penalty upon a man who kills another without malice, without premeditation, and without deliberation, and not knowing the person killed to be an officer such as sought to be protected under the terms of this bill.

This kind of legislation is not demanded, and is unwise and revolutionary. Any citizen, otherwise law abiding, and in no sense an anarchist, might kill the officers named, not knowing they were officers, under circumstances that might greatly mitigate the offense, and still suffer the penalty of death.

Mr. RAY of New York. I call for a vote on the amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken, and the chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. Division.

The committee divided, and there were 10 in the affirmative.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. No further count demanded.

The CHAIRMAN. The noes have it, and the amendment is rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That any person who unlawfully, purposely, and knowingly kills any ambassador or minister of a foreign state or country accredited to the United States, and being therein, and while engaged in the performance of his official duties, or because of his official character, or because of any of his official acts or omissions, shall suffer death.

Mr. GILBERT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 3, on page 4, by inserting, after the word "therein," in line 12, the words "or being within any territory or place subject to the jurisdiction thereof."

Mr. GILBERT. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have heard some half a dozen times during the discussion of this bill that Congress derived its authority to make this legislation under the law of nations. I do not understand that Congress derives any authority at all by international law. Whatever authority Congress has upon this subject is derived under the Constitution, either express or implied. In my judgment, Congress has no right to legislate upon this subject at all. But waiving that point, if Congress has any right to legislate upon this subject, if we are under any duty or obligation to legislate for the protection of foreign ministers, then certainly the legislation ought to be as extensive as the territory.

A new-fangled doctrine has grown up of late that the United States do not include the Territories, and the way this bill reads now, a foreign minister being killed within the territory of the United States, the person inflicting the wound or causing the death would be punished with death, but if the foreign minister should be within the District of Columbia or should be within the Territories of the United States the language of this bill does not include and does not protect him. Therefore, I say that if we are going to legislate at all let the legislation be inclusive, not only of the United States, but over every other territory over which the jurisdiction of the United States extends.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, I hope this amendment to that section will be voted down. There is no occasion for it.

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri moves to strike out the section.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, I only wish to speak on this amendment very briefly. This section is one that provides for punishing with the death penalty persons who in the States, as well as where the Federal Government has exclusive jurisdiction, may kill a foreign ambassador. I think it is entirely unnecessary. I think, instead of being a wise law, one that would be wholesome in effect, it would be a bad law. I do not think it tends to the protection of the foreign minister. It is making a distinction between our own people and the representatives of foreign governments, whether the foreign government be good or bad, or whether the representative be good or bad; making a distinction that ought not to exist.

Under the present state of the law, under the laws as they now are, there is ample provision made by the Federal law and by the State laws. The Federal law within the territory over which the United States has exclusive jurisdiction, and the State laws in the several States provide for the trial and punishment of every person who may commit any offense upon another, whether representative of a foreign Government or citizen of the United States.

The reason for legislating with reference to the President and the Vice-President, and the members of the Cabinet who may succeed to the Presidency, has no application whatever to such a provision as that which I have moved to strike out. If one were thoroughly satisfied with the proposed legislation as to the President and the Vice-President and others in succession, that it is absolutely necessary and wise without adulteration, yet we can not reason from it that there is any occasion for this provision. It relates to an entirely different subject. It has no relation to the perpetuity of the Government. We are seeking to protect our own Government in the person of its Chief Executive and those who may succeed to that high office, and this is put in as a compliment to foreign Governments, and is prejudicial, and theoretically and practically against our own people in leaving them out of that protection.

Mr. PARKER. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. DE ARMOND. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. PARKER. I was going to ask the gentleman whether it was not in the early part of our legislation, 1790, I think, that the United States was given exclusive jurisdiction over ambassadors?

Mr. DE ARMOND. That is another question entirely. It is not a question whether the United States should have exclusive jurisdiction when these ambassadors are interested on the one side or the other, when they are the victims of assault; that is not the question. But the question is whether the jurisdiction of the United States courts should be extended from those at its head to these ambassadors; whether jurisdiction of the United States should be extended, as to these particular representatives, into the States where it may not otherwise go; whether a man under aggravating circumstances who commits an offense upon one of these ambassadors, of no higher grade than the lowest degree of manslaughter, shall be punished with death. It is a provision that ought not to be in this bill. It is utterly useless legislation, against which every argument that can be urged with respect to the President and Vice-President must stand. These people do not stand in any such relation as our own high officers, and we have no like interest in them. When they are taken care of by the laws that are sacred to the American citizen, all has been done that ought to be done; all is done for them that need to be done for them, all that can be done for them, in justice and in fairness to our own people.

Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I trust that this amendment will not be adopted, and for this reason; This bill seeks to protect the President of the United States and those in line of succession. It does not go beyond that with reference to American officers; at the same time, it undertakes to protect the official heads of other nations accredited to this country and residing herein. In other words, it seeks to protect the official head of the United States and the official heads of the other nations who are residing in this country and over which we have jurisdiction,

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. If it would not disturb the gentleman, I would like to ask him a question.

Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I would like to ask the gentleman this question: We base our right to legislate with reference to the Vice-President and the Cabinet officers upon the fact that they are Government officials; they are officers of the Government, and we limit our powers with reference to them to the time when they are engaged in the discharge of their duties and where the assault is made by reason of their official character or on account of some official act done or omitted to be done. In my judgment that is perfectly constitutional for Congress to legislate that way. But as to these foreign ambassadors, they are not citizens of the United States; they are not officers of the United States, and upon what ground can Congress assume jurisdiction to legislate with reference to them? That is what I want to know.

Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts. I will undertake to answer the gentleman from Kentucky by referring him to 120 United States Reports, page 480—the case of United States v. Jonah. I read only a portion of the head notes.

The United States being bound to protect a right secured by the law of nations to another nation or its people, Congress has the constitutional power to enact laws for that purpose.

Under the principle there stated, Congress undoubtedly has the right to pass laws for the protection of the lives of ambassadors who are sent here to represent foreign countries.

But more than that, Mr. Chairman; at the present time every civilized nation is trying to stamp out anarchy. The nations are working in concert for this end. During the last two years a sovereign of Europe—the King of Italy—and the President of the United States have both fallen at the hands of anarchists; and in each case the plot was hatched upon American soil, and was carried into effect by the assassin crossing the ocean for the purpose of doing so. It strikes me it would be most ungracious if when at this time we are trying to protect our Chief Executive we should refuse to extend like protection to representatives in our country of foreign nations.

More than that, Mr. Chairman, under our law as it stands now if an unpremeditated attack were made upon the ambassador from Germany in the District of Columbia or in a Territory of the United States, the maximum penalty for that assault, if it did not result in death, would be three years in a State prison and a fine not exceeding $1,000. I trust, Mr. Chairman, that this amendment will not prevail.

Mr. SPIGHT. Mr. Chairman, if I could vote for that feature of this bill which has for its object the suppression of anarchy and the exclusion of anarchists from our country as an independent proposition, I should be glad to do so. Since the birth of our Republic it has been our proud boast that this "the land of the free and the home of the brave" should be an asylum for the oppressed of all nations, but it was never intended that it should be a rendezvous for the vicious and criminal classes who not only know nothing of the genius of our institutions, but are animated by an intense hatred of every form of organized government. They contribute nothing to our national greatness and prosperity, but are a standing menace to the peace, good order, and well-being of society.

Any legislation, to the extreme limit of constitutional power, which looks to their exclusion and expulsion from our borders shall have my hearty approval and support, and I regret that such provisions in this bill are so coupled with other vicious and dangerous propositions that I feel constrained to vote against it in its entirety.

One of the cardinal doctrines of the political school in which I have been trained is that no part of the sovereignty of the States is to be surrendered to the General Government except as expressly authorized by the Constitution.

That the General Government confers no power upon the States, but that the States have conferred certain powers upon the General Government through the medium of the Constitution. This is the doctrine of "States' rights" which it is fashionable in certain quarters to ridicule so unfeelingly. The measure now under consideration had its origin in the deep-seated and widespread indignation which followed the cruel and dastardly assassination of President McKinley.

The fact that the President was murdered by a brute who never saw him before and who could not claim the cowardly justification of a personal grudge was enough of itself to inflame public passion; but when we consider that the victim of this assassin was a man so gentle and so lovable as William McKinley, it is not strange that the people from every portion of this country, without regard to political and partisan differences, were wrought up to a degree of indignation and a sense of outrage never witnessed before. This feeling was nowhere stronger than in the "solid South," as I know from a personal intercourse and contact with the people.

The prompt trial, conviction, and execution of the miserable assassin only partially appeased the public demand for vengeance. It was known that the enemies of organized government and the propagandists of dangerous political, economic, and social heresies were behind the cowardly murderer and nerved his arm to strike the deadly blow, and not only was the sacrifice of his wretched life demanded, but there was also a general desire for such legislation as would, as far as possible, prevent the recurrence of such a tragedy.

This desire, accentuated and intensified by a constantly accumulating momentum, has reached the Congress of the United States, and grave Senators and dignified Representatives have been "swept off their feet" by this strong popular current and have literally "lost their heads." There is great danger that in the mad desire for political advantage and in the wild rush for popular approval a more serious blow at the spirit and genius of our institutions may be delivered than any that was ever directed at any man, no matter how lofty his station.

To follow the leadership of passion is always dangerous, but when the Congress of the United States, the greatest legislative body on earth, representing the people of the grandest, richest, and most powerful nation the sun ever shown upon, legislating not for an hour, a day, or a year, but for all time, shall yield to passion and shall forget the teachings of the fathers of the Republic and more than a hundred years of magnificent history, I can but be alarmed. I may be an "old fogy." I do not intend to be a modern "crank." I love my country. I love her institutions. I love her proud history. I love her people and all their interests, and I love them too much to sit idly by and see them sacrificed without raising my voice in earnest protest. I think it will be ineffectual, I think the bill will pass, and that my poor opposition will amount to nothing so far as results are concerned; but, be this as it may, my conscientious convictions lead me to oppose this bill, and knowing no better guide, next to the Word of God, than the dictates of an enlightened conscience, I am compelled under a stern sense of duty to vote against it.

I shall not stop to argue the legal and constitutional questions involved. They have been ably presented by others, and my judgment is convinced. I believe that the pending bill is in conflict with the Constitution, and is violative of the fundamental principles of our Government, and if enacted into law will be subversive of our free institutions. One of the basic principles of our system of government is that all men are equal before the law. I know that we have been drifting away from this old landmark, but I will never by word or vote acknowledge that this is an obsolete doctrine.

By the terms of this bill there is created a favored class of Americans whose lives are made more precious in the sight of the law than all others, and includes, also, a number of foreigners temporarily residing here as the representatives of their governments and fixes a death penalty for killing any one of those protected officers under such circumstances as would be only manslaughter in any other case, and takes away the jurisdiction of the State courts and confers it upon the Federal courts.

While I would regard it as a dangerous encroachment upon the equality of rights and the sovereignty of the States, I might bring myself to vote for such a provision which should apply alone to the President, but I can not agree that because a man happens to be a Cabinet officer or the representative of some foreign government he is entitled to be placed upon a higher plane before the law than every other citizen of the country. This all "smacks" of royalty, and is in keeping with the policy of imperialism into which we are so rapidly drifting.

The life of the humblest citizen is just as precious to him and to his family as is the case with a Government official. The willful, malicious, and deliberate killing of one human being is just as much murder in the eyes of God and man as is the killing of any other human being, and this has been recognized by all statute law in this country from the foundation of our Government, but here we are about to create a sacred class "hedged about with a divinity" and made superior, by the law of the land, to millions of others just as good as themselves.

If I had no other objection to this bill I would vote against it because of what is sought to be done in the last section. It undertakes to overturn a fundamental and vital principle in criminal law which is hoary with age and comes down to us from both divine and human law, and is recognized in every land where the rights of man are regarded. By this section it is intended to take from a man charged with crime the presumption of innocence and cast upon him the burden of proving that he is not guilty. This is an innovation so dangerous that I am astonished that any man, especially any lawyer, can bring himself to support it.

As I said in the beginning, I would be glad to support every line in this bill which is intended to suppress anarchy and anarchists, but there are so many other pernicious features that my judgment and conscience condemn that I am compelled to vote against it.

There is no reason why the jurisdiction should be removed from the State to the Federal courts. We have had three Presidents to die at the hands of assassins. Booth, who killed Lincoln, was shot to death in making the arrest. Guiteau, the murderer of Garfield, was convicted, condemned, and executed after a disgustingly long trial in the District of Columbia. Czolgosz killed McKinley in the State of New York and was tried, convicted, and executed promptly under the laws of that State.

No murderer of a President has ever escaped. None ever will. There is no need for this legislation. Is any man foolish enough to suppose that the anactment of such a law prior to the killing of Lincoln would have saved him, or Garfield, or McKinley? In each case the assassin knew that death to himself would be the result, and no law, however rigid, would have prevented the crime.

Let us be careful that, swayed by the passion of the hour, we do not commit a grievous wrong against the established principles of our American policy and criminal jurisprudence when no good can result from it, and when such action is wholly unnecessary. [Loud applause.]

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, with reference to the motion of the gentleman from Missouri to strike out this section, I desire to say I have had more trouble in my own mind over the proposition involved in this section than I have had in regard to any other part of this bill. I can understand perfectly well how the Federal courts can be given jurisdiction to try a citizen of this country for striking down an official of this Government when he is engaged in his official duties or on account of some official act performed or the refusal to perform some official act or because of his official character. I can understand that perfectly well.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Did the gentleman take in the full force of the citation given by the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I am very candid to say that I did not.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That citation was to this effect: The Supreme Court of the United States has held that we have the constitutional power to pass a statute prohibiting the counterfeiting of the bonds, securities, or notes of a foreign government, by reason of the international obligation and duty resting upon us by virtue of comity with respect to a foreign power. Now, then, if we can prohibit the counterfeiting of the notes and securities of foreign governments, is it possible that we can not protect such a government itself when it is here in the person of its representative? That is the naked proposition.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. In other words, the sovereign himself is present by proxy.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. LANHAM. We do protect it by the whole body of our laws.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. This is a question of constitutional law.

Mr. LANHAM. The question of the power is one thing and that of the policy another. The Constitution says that we can declare war, grant letters of marque and reprisal, etc.; but still we must determine the question whether it is expedient to exercise the power.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Would the gentleman say that the government which can punish the counterfeiting of a foreign note because of international comity toward the foreign government can not protect the foreign government itself when represented here in the person of its ambassador?

Mr. LANHAM. I am not disputing the question of constitutionality; but I do disagree with the gentleman as to the alleged necessity for this measure.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Maine a question or two, if the gentleman from Kentucky will yield.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CLARK. The whole intent of this bill is to change manslaughter into a capital offense in certain cases, is it not?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Not necessarily that.

Mr. CLARK. I do not say the whole intent, but that is the principal one.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That may be one of the effects of the bill.

Mr. CLARK. I want to ask the gentleman as to the feasibility, not as to the constitutionality of this question, but whether, as a matter of fact, it is a feasible proposition or it is an expedient one to say here of 75 ambassadors and ministers in the city of Washington that if a man killed one of them unlawfully, under conditions that would be only manslaughter if he killed you or me, that it shall be made a capital offense simply because he happens to be the representative of a foreign government here.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I will say frankly that the committee based this section largely, so far as feasibility is concerned——

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to have all this time taken out of my time.

Mr. RAY of New York. Oh, no; this is running by unanimous consent.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Upon the idea that if there was any killing of a foreign ambassador under the circumstances contemplated by the bill, it would undoubtedly be the result of the organized effort that exists already as directed against all governments, and the committee felt that if an ambassador was killed under those circumstances and by those people who were engaged in that propaganda there was no harm in making the provisions of this bill somewhat drastic.

Mr. CLARK. Well, the presumption is that a man who comes here as an ambassador of a great country is a gentleman, but even gentlemen sometimes go out——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended for ten minutes, because this is not a trivial question that we are discussing now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Kentucky be extended ten minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLARK. What I started in to say was that as a rule of course ministers and ambassadors would be high-class men, but we have no assurance whatever that that is always the case. Now take the minor countries, these revolutionary countries. They may send us over here a minister who is hot-blooded, and suppose a man has a conversation with him and the minister pursues his hot-blooded method and either insults the man grossly or absolutely makes an assault upon him and the other retaliates by killing the minister. Under our laws as they now exist it would be manslaughter. Under this proposed law it would be a capital offense. Now, there are something like ten or fifteen millions of people in the United States who if slapped in the face by one of those ministers would kill the minister.

Mr. LANHAM. And the minister would be presumed to be acting in the discharge of his official duties under this bill.

Mr. CLARK. Most assuredly. The rule among Americans generally is that if one man assaults another the one assaulted is going to kill the other. That is the way people look at their rights in this country, and it seems to me it is crowding this to a great extent to take the foreign ministers into it in the way you have in this bill.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Let me call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that this section contains the same qualification with reference to the discharge of duties and official character and acts of omission that the section in relation to the President has if assault is made independent of his official character, which would be the circumstances suggested by the illustration of the gentleman. This statute would not apply. There is no presumption in relation to an ambassador, and I submit to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] that that is so, under section 13, because it applies expressly and alone to the President, Vice-President, and other officers entitled by law to succeed.

Mr. LANHAM. Let me correct the gentleman, that in all prosecutions under the provisions of the first seven sections of this act——

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes, "until the contrary is proved, that the President of the United States or Vice-President of the United States or other officer of the United States entitled by law to succeed to the Presidency, as the case may be," etc. I think the gentleman will concede that I am right.

Mr. LANHAM. Yes, I stand corrected about that. I thought for the moment that it applied to all the seven sections of the bill.

Mr. CLARK. Now, I will give an example of the class of cases that I have been talking about.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I desire to yield the time that was allotted to me to the gentleman from Missouri. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK. No, no; do not do that. I want to give an example of what I was informed by a gentleman, whom I believe told the truth, happened in this city actually. When Mr. Blaine was Secretary of State, he deputed a young man in his office to go and wait on a certain minister here. The young man could not find him at the legation and hunted him up, and finally found him somewhere at a club. He told him what Mr. Blaine had sent him to do. The minister flared up and gave him a most tremendous "cussing." This young man that Blaine had sent there then gave the minister a good sound kicking, and when he went back from there to Mr. Blaine's office the young man found the minister there raising a great hullabaloo. Mr. Blaine reproved the young man publicly, but when he got him into his private room he congratulated him and said, "But thank God that it was not Lord Pauncefote that you have been kicking." [Laughter.]

Now, suppose he had killed the minister under those circumstances. It would have been an extreme hardship to hang him for it.

Mr. FOX. It was in the discharge of his official duty.

Mr. CLARK. The minister was in the discharge of his official duty when he did the "cussing," because it was an official matter on which the young man had gone to see him.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. That may be; but is not the intendment of this bill plain and palpable, that when a man kills another because of a private grudge or because of a private quarrel, or while engaged in a private quarrel, that the offense does not come within the purview of this bill at all?

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. It certainly does.

Mr. CLARK. That is the theory, but the application is not so certain. I am in favor of the principle of this bill, but I do not want to see anything put into it that will induce a large number of members to vote against it, and there is more opposition to this section about these foreign ambassadors and ministers than there is about all the rest of this bill put together. Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask that my friend from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH] have his own time. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] and myself have taken it up.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has about covered all the objections that I had wished to state to this section. I myself believe that there is more antagonism to this section than there is to all the remainder of this bill; and while I have not had an opportunity carefully to examine the case that has been cited by the gentleman from Maine and the gentleman from Massachusetts, yet I think that a critical examination will develop some difference between that case and the cases that might arise under this provision of the law.

Now, as I have said, I do not believe that the Federal Government of the United States has any power under the comity existing among nations to pass such a provision as this third section here. As I say, I have not carefully examined the case determined by the Supreme Court, but upon principles of natural justice and fundamental law I doubt that Congress possesses this power, and I have had more trouble in reconciling myself to this proposition than I have to all the remainder of the bill. I believe that rather than to incumber a fairly good law with this provision, which is, at least in my opinion, of doubtful constitutionality, it would be better to eliminate it from the bill and let us have a bill about whose constitutionality there can be no kind of question.

This is all I care to say.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH] to strike out section 3.

The question being taken, on a division, demanded by Mr. SMITH of Kentucky, there were—ayes 42, noes 48.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chairman appointed Mr. DE ARMOND and (at the request of Mr. RAY of New York) Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts.

The committee again divided; and there were—ayes 59, noes 72.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out of section 3 all after the word "therein" in line 12, all of line 13, and the words "of his official acts or omissions" in line 14; so the section will read:

"That any person who unlawfully, purposely, and knowingly kills any ambassador or minister of a foreign state or country accredited to the United States, and being therein, shall suffer death."

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, there is some reason for the introduction of these qualifying words in other sections of this bill, because there is some doubt in the minds of gentlemen in charge of the bill as to the constitutional power of the Federal Government to protect one, even though he were an officer, unless he were engaged in the discharge of his official duty at the time he is assaulted. That question does not arise in relation to ambassadors and foreign ministers. When this country invites diplomatic representatives of foreign countries it gives its solemn engagement that it will exercise the powers under its command for their due and proper protection. Their protection is based upon international law, it is based upon the provisions of treaties, and it is one of the most solemn obligations of a government duly to protect the accredited diplomatic representatives of other governments with which it has commercial relations.

Now, the bill as it is written limits the power of the Federal Government to protect foreign ambassadors when they are engaged in the discharge of their official duties or because of their official character. The country is familiar with recent occurrences in China, when all of the diplomatic representatives of Christian civilization were beleaguered and assailed by the organized society known as the Boxers, and their lives were in jeopardy. At great pains and after the expenditure of a great deal of money and after a great deal of anxiety the powers of Christendom rescued their ministers from the danger, and in negotiating terms of peace one of the conditions was that the Chinese Government should properly punish the offenders and make adequate and ample reparation in the way of money indemnity.

Suppose, now, to illustrate, that the diplomatic representative of the Chinese Empire were in the city of Chicago or Ann Arbor, Mich., as I understand he visited those places a short time ago; suppose he should be assailed by a mob something like the Boxers in China by way of retaliation and his life should be in jeopardy. In making reparation for the injury inflicted upon the sovereignty of China what could this Government do? Suppose the Emperor of China should demand that we punish the perpetrators and pay an indemnity. The Government would be compelled to confess that there was no law, absolutely no law, under which it could inflict punishment upon the men who have committed an offense of that grave and international magnitude. The history of the Mafia riots in New Orleans is familiar to the minds of all.

Citizens of the Kingdom of Italy were taken by angry mobs and put to death without trial by jury, and we know about the famous correspondence over that occurrence, that has become historical, in which Secretary Blaine was compelled to confess that there was no power in the Federal Government to perform the requirements of the Kingdom of Italy, ordinary requirements, the usual conditions imposed by the civilized powers of the earth. He said that the Federal Congress had never enacted a law authorizing the General Government, under the power it has under the Constitution, to protect alien subjects here, and therefore he said the Government was utterly unable to do what the Kingdom of Italy required, and what was regarded on all hands as a reasonable requirement.

Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts. I would like to ask the gentleman this question: If the amendment he proposes is adopted, then there is a greater protection extended to an ambassador than is extended to the President under this bill.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That is a suggestion that has no kind of importance in this connection. I think that the gentleman will concede that there is no responsibility resting upon the shoulders of this Government of a more solemn character than that of protecting the lives of the diplomatic representatives of the different foreign countries that it invites here and through whom it transacts international business. They are utterly at the mercy of our laws. I submit that there is no more solemn duty resting upon us, and if we fail to protect our own citizens adequately; if we fail to throw sufficient safeguards around the Chief Executive of the country, it does not in the least exonerate us from this important duty. President Harrison in one of his messages, perhaps the last one he delivered to Congress, recommended—seriously recommended—the passage of a Federal law making it a crime to assault or assassinate any subject of a foreign country who was here under and by virtue of the terms of a treaty, because, as he forcibly said, it was liable to lead to international complications. There is hardly a session of Congress that claims for damages are not presented to this Government for indemnity for the assassination or murder of subjects of foreign Governments.

Mr. GILBERT. May I ask the gentleman a question?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GILBERT. Is there anything——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GILBERT. I ask unanimous consent that he may be permitted to answer this question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Indiana may be extended for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GILBERT. I want to know if there is any country in the world that affords greater protection to foreign ministers than is afforded for the protection of her own citizens?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Well, there ought to be none. I am not prepared to say whether there be any such country or not. There ought to be none. The Federal Government might be in that category, as it could protect the lives of citizens and subjects of foreign countries under international law, it has the constitutional power to do it, but it does not have the constitutional power to protect the lives and the property of its own citizens where they are assailed within the limits of a State.

Mr. GILBERT. Do you think it is a reflection upon our Government?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Whether it is a reflection upon our Government or not, it is a simple statement of fact.

Mr. GILBERT. Why will not your doctrine legitimately extend to the proposition that all the police regulations and all criminal law ought to be conferred upon the General Federal Government and surrendered by the States?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Oh, no, it does not involve that at all, because when we negotiate treaties with foreign countries by the terms of which we admit foreign subjects into our jurisdiction, we give them a solemn promise that we will surround those subjects with adequate protection as far as our laws and institutions will permit, and that is one of the high and solemn obligations that we are under with reference to our relations with foreign countries. It is these obligations we are endeavoring to provide for, and the qualifications, I again assert, Mr. Chairman, limiting the crime that is attempted to be defined by this section, are unnecessary to make the section constitutional.

I believe that a general law ought to be enacted by this Government authorizing the Federal Congress to punish those who feloniously assault citizens of a foreign country received within our jurisdiction, not because I love them better than our own, but because if we fail to furnish adequate protection it is liable to involve this Government in dangerous foreign complications. We are called to account for it every year, and our weakness has been held up before the world for more than half a century. We are humiliated on account of the lack of power as one of the sovereign units of the great world's family of nations to perform in full measure our international obligations. It is a question more important than at first blush it would seem.

Judging from some of the sentiments that have been uttered in this debate, if a representative of an unpopular foreign government should be unlawfully and feloniously attacked and slain here, it would be extremely difficult to get a jury that would administer any kind of punishment at all. If the Federal Government does not see fit to maintain diplomatic relations with a foreign country, well and good; but as long as it does, I ask the gentleman if it does not owe it the high and solemn duty to carry out in full all of the implied incidents of that relation? If we can not protect diplomatic representatives of foreign sovereigns, we should sever our relations with them.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, this amendment ought not to be agreed to. By this bill we go as far as we ought to go. We protect these foreign ambassadors and ministers when they are engaged in the performance of official duties; we invite them here; we admit them here; we permit them to be here for that purpose. When they are not engaged in those duties, let them take their chance the same as American citizens. If they see fit to go from their post of duty and visit through the various States, let them do what the American citizen does—look to the State for protection. The State will take care of them; the juries of the several States will take care of them, and they will have justice. I trust the amendment will be disagreed to and let us go along with the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking from section 3, lines 1 and 2, the words "unlawfully, purposely, and knowingly," and insert in lieu thereof the words "willfully and with malice aforethought."

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I want to offer an amendment to section 3.

The Clerk read as follows:

Section 3, line 9, after the word "purposely," insert the word "maliciously."

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

SEC. 4. That any person who attempts to commit either of the offenses defined in sections 1, 2, and 3 of this act shall be imprisoned not less than ten years.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. WARNOCK having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills and joint resolution of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 5931. An act granting an increase of pension to Clara E. Daniels;

S. 5879. An act to remove the charge of desertion from the army record of Eli Hibbard;

S. 4374. An act granting an increase of pension to Abraham Shreeves;

S. 4183. An act granting an increase of pension to Oceana B. Irwin;

S. 5049. An act for the relief of Sylvester Van Sickel;

S. 5045. An act granting an increase of pension to Mary A. Moore;

S. 5836. An act granting an increase of pension to Jesse Nesbit Smith;

S. 4623. An act granting an increase of pension to Lewis F. Ross;

S. 5774. An act granting a pension to Asa E. Sampson;

S. 5719. An act granting an increase of pension to Sidney V. Lund;

S. 1980. An act granting a pension to William D. Stites;

S. 4709. An act granting a pension to Nelson W. Wade;

S. 3508. An act granting an increase of pension to James M. Thomas;

S. 3493. An act granting an increase of pension to Charles W. Rose;

S. 1743. An act granting a pension to Cornelia F. Whitney;

S. 5893. An act granting an increase of pension to Willi Thomas;

S. 5361. An act granting an increase of pension to Martha A. Johnston;

S. 473. An act granting an increase of pension to Mabery H. Presley;

S. 1801. An act granting an increase of pension to James K. Van Matre;

S. 1205. An act granting a pension to Isabelle H. Irish;

S. 1193. An act granting an increase of pension to Jane M. Meyer;

S. 5782. An act granting a pension to Nannie B. Turner;

S. 1944. An act granting an increase of pension to Ann E. Tillson;

S. 3236. An act to correct the military record of Hays Gaskill;

S. 1479. An act granting an increase of pension to Thomas L. Caughey;

S. 586. An act for the relief of Frank C. Darling;

S. 4923. An act to ratify and confirm a supplemental agreement with the Creek tribe of Indians, and for other purposes; and

S. R. 83. Joint resolution directing the Secretary of War to investigate the feasibility of operating an ocean dredger on the bar at the mouth of the Columbia River, in the States of Oregon and Washington.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 3442. An act to correct the record of John O'Brien;

H. R. 7679. An act granting an increase of pension to Franklin Snyder;

H. R. 13278. An act granting an increase of pension to Levi H. Collins;

H. R. 3309. An act to remove the charge of desertion against Ephraim H. Gallion;

H. R. 12828. An act granting a pension to Mary E. Culver;

H. R. 9723. An act granting an honorable discharge to Levi Wells;

H. R. 12420. An act granting a pension to Wesley Brummett; and

H. R. 9870. An act to correct the military record of Reinhard Schneider.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 9496. An act granting a pension to Forrest E. Andrews;

H. R. 1741. An act granting an increase of pension to Griffith Evans; and

H. R. 12797. An act to ratify act No. 65 of the twenty-first Arizona legislature.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the reports of the committees of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to bills of the following titles:

H. R. 8794. An act granting an increase of pension to Henry I. Smith; and

H. R. 9544. An act granting an increase of pension to George W. Barry.

PROTECTION OF THE PRESIDENT.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out in line 17, page 4, after the word "shall," the following: "may be imprisoned not less than ten years," and substitute the following: "suffer death or imprisonment for life, as the jury may recommend."

Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, if this amendment is adopted, this section will read as follows:

That any person who attempts to commit either of the offenses defined in sections 1, 2, and 3 of this act shall suffer death or imprisonment for life, as the jury may recommend.

I want to suppose just one case and leave it there. This is a bill to protect government. It is not a bill to protect individuals. It is designed to protect the Government against those who make attacks on officials with a view to destroying the Government. Now, let us suppose a case of an anarchist who, with malice aforethought, or, to use the language in the bill, who purposely, knowingly, and willfully undertakes to take the life of a President. He complies with all of the qualifications and limitations of the act, but, in the attempt to take the life of the President of the United States, he just falls short of doing it; but he successfully incapacitates the President so that he is unfit for further performance of official duties.

Now, I think you will agree with me that he has completed all that he intended to accomplish, and that was to incapacitate the Chief Executive of the country; and yet, under the provisions of this bill as it now stands, the only penalty that could be imposed upon him would be imprisonment.

Mr. RAY of New York. Imprisonment for life.

Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts. The imprisonment must be for at least ten years and may be for life.

Now, my amendment leaves it for the jury to take into consideration all the facts. If it be an extreme case, where the assailant has so far injured the Chief Executive as to render him incapable of further service as the chief ruler of the American people, then we leave it to a jury to say whether the assailant ought to suffer death or not. And we may safely leave that question in the hands of an American jury.

I say to you, Mr. Chairman, and I say to the gentlemen of this House that the people of this country demand a more drastic punishment than is provided in the bill reported by the committee. When this matter was under consideration in committee I fought out this question, and I reserved the right at that time to offer the amendment which I now submit, and I did so because I believed that the people of this country demand that the punishment shall be greater than has been written in this bill.

In my view, Mr. Chairman, we are not legislating for the protection of human life; we are legislating for the protection of the Government; we are legislating against a crime which does not affect only the life of the President but affects the lives, the welfare, and the interests of 80,000,000 of people. And are we going on record here by saying that he who makes a premeditated assault upon the President of the United States so as to incapacitate him mentally and physically for the further performance of duty, so that he has to step out of office and some one in the line of succession take his place—are we going to say that such an anarchist, such a red-handed assassin, shall receive only imprisonment at the hands of an American court and an American jury?

I trust that this amendment which I have proposed will be adopted by the House and that we shall go on record as having enacted a bill which shall be forcible and which shall be sufficient to meet the purpose for which it has been framed.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, we provide in this bill that if a person attempts to commit either of the offenses mentioned in the first three sections he shall be punished by imprisonment for a term not less than five years; such imprisonment in certain cases may extend during his natural life. Now, that is as severe as the law of any State is or has been made in any civilized country for the last fifty years. As I said the other day, the efficiency of a law in every aspect is not because of its bloodthirsty character; not because of the bloodthirsty disposition evinced by the legislators who enact it; not in the severity of the punishment. When you have a too severe penalty it is many times impossible to secure a conviction.

Acting under that idea, this Congress three years ago passed a law leaving it with the jury in all cases of murder in the first degree to say whether the criminal should suffer death or imprisonment for life. Two hundred and fifty years ago there were in England nearly 250 crimes punishable with death. In the case of treason it was the law that the offender should not only lose his life, but it was thought that the crime would be more efficiently repressed, less liable to be committed, and the law better calculated to protect the Government if there were added after-death punishment; so it was provided that the body of the person convicted should be drawn and quartered and the quarters hung up at the gates of the city and his head put on a pike.

At that time it was punishable by death for a poor widow to steal a loaf of bread to feed her starving children. It was punishable with death if a man robbed another of a dollar, or of a horse, or of $1,000. So I might go on and recite 250 offenses which were made punishable by death. Yet, in spite of such severity of punishment, crime ran riot in the streets of London. Robberies were committed in the suburbs of that great city and through the byways and on the highways. And in New England, soon after our Puritan forefathers came and settled that great country, there was provided a punishment for the crime of witchcraft; and a person convicted of that crime was subjected to the punishment of having his ears cut off, or a hole cut through his tongue, or some punishment of similar severity inflicted.

But civilization has moved right on, even in New England. [Laughter.] We have no longer there any laws against witchcraft. The severity of her laws have been mitigated. There is only one offense there punishable with death—or two—murder and treason. We know nothing now of drawing and quartering; there is no punishment after death except such as is given by our Heavenly Father.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. And some people doubt that.

Mr. RAY of New York. Yes, some doubt that.

Now, I appeal to this Congress not to be carried away by passion. Let us not think we are to lessen the commission of crimes of this character by inflicting the death penalty where a simple attempt is made which fails. By such severity you discredit your law. You may gratify a few people who want the law very severe, and who in advocating such a law may think they are doing a patriotic thing, but you will offend the masses of those people who believe that

> The quality of mercy is not strained;
> It droppeth as the gentle rain from heaven
> Upon the place beneath; it is twice bless'd;
> It blesseth him that gives and him that takes.

[Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I trust this amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. WARNOCK. Mr. Chairman, the amendment to this bill which I just proposed to offer is substantially the same as the one now pending offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. POWERS]. The bill as presented by the committee provides that any person who attempts to kill the President and the officers named in the same section shall be imprisoned not less than ten years. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts punishes such an attempt by imprisonment for life, or death, as the jury shall recommend.

In passing upon this question it is well to ascertain, if possible, what the people generally think about it. For, after all, an enlightened public opinion is about as safe a guide as we can follow. You will all readily recall the fact that about the fourth or fifth day after President McKinley was shot that the word was sent out to the country that he was improving rapidly and that he was in a fair way to recovery. The country rejoiced over the good news, thanksgiving services were held, congratulatory messages were sent, despondency gave way to hope, and the people said, "Our President will live." But in the midst of the general rejoicing there was a widespread feeling of the most intense dissatisfaction when it was learned that if the President recovered his assailant could only be punished by imprisonment not exceeding ten years.

This penalty was universally felt to be wholly inadequate for the crime committed, and everywhere the demand went up for the enactment of laws which would specifically protect the President. It was well known that if the President died the laws of the State of New York would punish the assassin by death, and it was equally well known that the assassin would be thus punished because he had killed a man and not because he had killed the President; hence the universal, stern demand of the people for legislation on this subject. It is safe to say that 90 per cent of the members of this House publicly declared themselves at that time in favor of such legislation and voluntarily pledged themselves to the support and enactment of such legislation.

Let us, then, consider the bill proposed by the committee in its full scope and contrast it with the Senate bill.

For more than twenty years there had been organizations in this country and in Europe which had openly advocated violence and unreasoning hatred against everyone in executive place, were he a devil or an angel. Under the influence of these teachings some of the most dastardly crimes of the age had been committed.

At Haymarket Square, in Chicago, in 1886, at a meeting where revolutionary doctrines were proclaimed, a bomb was thrown, resulting in the death of 7 policemen and the injury of a large number of others.

In 1893 at Barcelona, Spain, an anarchist congress was held. A bomb was thrown by anarchists, which resulted in killing 30 people and wounding 80. And in Chicago the same year Mayor Carter H. Harrison was assassinated.

In 1894 President Carnot, of France, was assassinated.

In 1897 the premier of Spain was assassinated by an Italian anarchist.

In 1898 the Empress Elizabeth was brutally murdered by another Italian anarchist, and less than two years ago King Humbert was assassinated by another anarchist.

In September, 1901, McKinley was assassinated by an anarchist. The time had come when all those who proclaim themselves as enemies of human society and human government should not be permitted to hold meetings to teach their diabolical doctrines. The time had come when they should not be permitted to disseminate their revolutionary documents and papers. The time had come when any attempt upon the lives of any of our chief executives should be punishable by death.

William McKinley was the victim of these teachings. When the assassin fired the fatal bullet on the 6th of last September which killed our President, he was not actuated by the spirit of revenge or of personal hate. He did not know the President. If he had, he could never have fired the fatal shot. The President had never harmed him. He fired the shot because he had learned to hate all those in authority. McKinley had to die because he was the head of a mighty nation. He was killed because he was President and not because he was McKinley. He was called to suffer a martyr's fate because he dared to accept the high office to which the people called him. How heroically he met his fate!

The world has been thrilled with the utterances of John Huss and Archbishops Cranmer and Latimer and others of the holy martyrs as they were led to the stake to be burned. We have wondered at their fortitude and courage and endurance. We have marveled at their expressions of holy triumph, but there is nothing in all history that for pathos and courage and sublime faith equals that scene at the Milburn house in Buffalo last September when William McKinley, stricken down in the midst of his greatest usefulness, at the very zenith of his fame, with the prospect of long life and the accomplishment of his most cherished aspirations, turning to the stricken group around his bedside and saying, "Good-bye all, good-bye. It is God's way. Not our will, but His be done."

William McKinley is dead, but his character abides. The principles of justice and equity and liberty and humanity and patriotism for which he stood will continue to abide until at last all nations, all peoples in all climes and everywhere, will be brought under their sway.

> For right is right, since God is God,
> And right the day must win;
> To doubt would be disloyalty,
> To falter would be sin.

And now we are here to carry out the will of the people; to enact such laws as will protect the President as President; to protect him as the head of the Government.

It has been argued on this floor that the President is not entitled to any more protection than any other citizen; that the life of one good citizen, however humble, ought to be protected with the same care and vigilance as the life of the best and highest and mightiest citizen of the Republic. The gentlemen who have advanced these arguments have utterly and absolutely failed to comprehend the scope and purpose of this bill. The purpose of this bill is to protect the President, to protect our Government, and does not in any sense legislate for the President as a citizen, but only as the head of the Government. No one disputes the proposition that all citizens are entitled to precisely the same protection. No one has even advocated any discrimination in the protection that should be accorded by the laws to every citizen, whether of high or low degree. Why gentlemen should set up that man of straw and proceed to demolish him is difficult to understand. The equality of protection to all citizens alike is not involved in the measure before the House. The sole question is, Shall we protect our Government and the head of our Government against the assaults and conspiracies of anarchists?

It has also been argued here that the bill is unconstitutional, that it invades the jurisdiction of the States, and that for the same reason the Senate bill is also unconstitutional, and as both bills are before us for consideration let us consider briefly the Senate bill. For the purpose of this argument I consider only so much of section 1 of the Senate bill as is necessary to understand the provisions which are said by these gentlemen to be unconstitutional.

> SEC. 1. That any person who shall, within the limits of the United States, or any place subject to the jurisdiction thereof, willfully and maliciously kill or cause the death of the President or Vice-President of the United States, or any officer thereof upon whom the powers and duties of the President may devolve under the Constitution and laws, shall be punished with death.

The mistake which the gentlemen make who argue that this provision is unconstitutional has already been referred to, to wit: They have not been able to get out of their minds that this is not a bill to punish murder, but a bill to protect the head of the Government; a bill to prevent an assault upon the Government itself; and these gentlemen have proceeded to argue about the elements which are necessary to constitute murder in the first and second degrees, and what constitutes manslaughter, and the equal rights of citizens and the rights of the States and the limitations of the Constitution.

I assert that under the Constitution of the United States anything is constitutional which is necessary to the preservation of the Government; that the extremity makes the law, as for instance, the war measures. The legal-tender act, for example, would not have been held constitutional except for the extremity. Can there be any greater extremity for a government than that of being deprived of its legally constituted head? A government left to the mercy of contending factions, each striving for supremacy, would soon bring about the destruction of the rights of the weaker, or, worse than all, would result in anarchy. But it is not necessary to resort to the plea of extremity to find constitutional warrant for the enactment of this law.

There is an inherent right in any government to take such measures or to enact such laws as are necessary for its safety and its preservation, unless there is an express limitation upon that right in its constitutional law. There is no such inhibition in the Constitution of the United States. The rights reserved to the States do not limit the power of the General Government to do any and all things necessary for its safety and preservation.

The majority of the committee presenting this bill admits the foregoing proposition to be true, but asserts that the enactment for the protection of the President, in order to be constitutional, must, in set terms, provide that the assault on the President, or the injury done to him, must be committed or inflicted under certain circumstances, and that outside of those particular circumstances there is no power in Congress to protect the President within the several States. In furtherance of that assertion, the majority of the committee has offered a substitute for the Senate bill.

I quote only so much of the substitute as is necessary to show the position of the committee:

> That any person who unlawfully, purposely, and knowingly kills the President of the United States while he is engaged in the performance of his official duties, or because of his official character, or because of any of his official acts or omissions shall suffer death.

It is contended that without these provisions in the bill, as to how the President was engaged and as to his official acts, etc., it would be unconstitutional. This contention is based largely upon the reasoning of the Supreme Court of the United States in the following cases: In re Neagle, 135 U. S., 1; United States v. Fox, 95 U. S., 670, and some other cases cited. But none of these cases decide the question now before us for consideration.

In the Neagle case the court devoted a great part of the opinion to proving that Justice Field of the Supreme Court was engaged in the performance of an official duty when on his way from Los Angeles, Cal., where he had held court, to San Francisco to perform a similar duty, and that when on that journey he was attacked by Judge Terry, and Neagle killed Terry in defending Field. Neagle was a deputy marshal and accompanied Field by order of the Department of Justice for the purpose of protecting him from threatened personal violence. The court held—

That Neagle under the circumstances was acting under the authority of the United States and was justified in so doing.

The decision being based on the finding that Field was in the discharge of his official duties does not limit or restrict the following provision of the Constitution found in Article I, section 8:

The Congress shall have power * * * to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof.

That grant of power is ample to give Congress the authority to protect the life and person of the very agency by which the Government is carried on. Let us consider the effect of the proposed substitute offered by the committee.

Every lawyer will admit that in order to convict a person of the violation of any criminal statute it is necessary to prove, beyond a reasonable doubt, every fact which goes to make up the offense as described in that statute.

Measured by that rule, it would be necessary, in order to convict under the bill recommended by the committee, to prove that the defendant knowingly killed the President while he was engaged in the performance of his official duties, or because of his official character, or because of his official acts or omissions. The burden, by this bill, is placed on the Government of proving a state of facts that might be exceedingly difficult to prove, and which it ought not to be compelled to prove in the case of a man who unlawfully, purposely, and knowingly kills the President. I am in favor of a law that will protect the President whether he is asleep or awake, whether he is writing a message to Congress or riding in a park for recreation, not because he is a great citizen, but because he is the head of the Government.

Some have argued that there is no burden placed on the Government by the provisions of this bill, for the reason that the President, because of the nature of his duties, is always engaged in the performance of his official duties, and that it is a presumption of law that, as the head of the Government and Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, there is never a time when he is not so engaged. If that be true, then it is worse than useless to so word a statute as to compel the United States to prove it as an independent fact. It tenders an issue of fact to be tried which the law presumes to be already established. It requires the question of fact to be submitted to the jury for their determination upon the testimony and the charge of the court, and if the facts disclosed that the President was killed while engaged in fishing on Decoration Day, who can tell what the verdict of the jury would be?

There is no question but what if a person maliciously, deliberately, purposely, and with premeditation killed a boy who was fishing on Decoration Day within the jurisdiction of the State of New York, he would be punished by death, under the State laws; but if you undertake to try a man in the Federal courts under this proposed law who kills the President, who is fishing on Decoration Day, the assassin might be acquitted by the jury on the ground that he was not engaged in the performance of his official duties. Of course the jury might find the assassin guilty under the other provisions of the bill, but if they did the Government would have to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the assassin killed him because of his official character or because of his official acts or omissions.

Why require all that proof? Why all that circumlocution? Why not protect the head of our Government by enacting that whoever willfully and maliciously kills or causes the death of the President shall suffer death?

If, on the other hand, there are times in the contemplation of law when the President is not engaged in the performance of his official duties, then it becomes the duty of Congress to throw around him the protection of the law at such times, for the killing of the head of the Government is fraught with as great danger to the Republic if he be killed in a theater as if he were killed at a Cabinet meeting.

The other cases cited by gentlemen were cases in which the Supreme Court of the United States passed upon acts of Congress enacted for the protection of colored men of the South under and by virtue of the constitutional amendments. These acts were held unconstitutional because by their terms they protected white citizens as well, and as the provisions of the laws could not be separated, and included citizens not named in the amendments, the entire law was held unconstitutional; but none of these questions are involved in the proposed legislation. This measure provides for the protection of the Government, and not the protection of the citizen.

Let us enact a law that when a person unlawfully and maliciously kills or causes the death of the President of the United States or any officer upon whom the powers and duties of the President may devolve under the Constitution and laws may be punished with death. [Loud applause.]

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I wish the gentlemen of the House would go back to the 7th day of September last and recall the feeling of horror and indignation that passed over their respective communities when it was learned that Czolgosz, the President's assassin, could not be punished to exceed ten years in the penitentiary, under the laws of the State of New York, provided the President lived. The first thing the citizen asked was, could any arrangement be made by which he could be given a longer and severer sentence? Everyone seemed horrified that the assassin would escape with only a few years in the penitentiary, provided the President lived, as it seemed not unlikely for a day or two.

Everybody knew that he was an anarchist who had gone to Buffalo for the purpose of shooting the President to death because he was the President, and only for that reason; that the assassination had been deliberately planned, no doubt, and thoroughly understood, possibly, by others, that he was to be there on that occasion, at that time, to take the life of the President of the United States.

I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. POWERS] will obtain. The man who shoots at the President of the United States for the purpose of taking his life ought, even if he misses him or if he wounds him, to suffer the same penalty as if his intent were carried out and death followed. [Applause.]

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I should like to ask my colleague a question. The trouble in the case of President McKinley's assassination was that the law of the State of New York would not permit the punishment of the assassin to be greater than imprisonment for ten years in the event that the President had lived. But now if you fix the punishment as proposed in this statute, that he may be imprisoned not less than ten years, does not that put it in the discretion of the jury to make it any number of years, and can we not trust the juries of the country to fix that penalty?

Mr. ALEXANDER. If the gentleman from Kentucky will pardon me, I believe that under the circumstances attending the assassination of President McKinley the assassin should suffer death or imprisonment for life, even if his crime did not result in death.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the gentleman a question. I will ask him if the argument that he has made in favor of the severe penalty for the assaulting of the President and Vice-President and those in the line of succession does not make it apparent that that third section about the ambassadors and ministers ought to go out of the bill?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I do not think so.

Mr. NEVIN. Mr. Chairman, I trust the American Congress when it legislates never will get in the frame of mind in which the gentleman from New York [Mr. ALEXANDER] wants it to be, namely, the way its members felt the day they heard of the infamous attack upon President McKinley. I think we ought to get away from that feeling as far as possible when we come to pass laws; and I want to call the gentleman's attention to another thing, and that is, that probably in the history of this country there will never again be an attack under such circumstances and of such an infamous character upon the President of the United States. This bill provides that if anyone makes an attempt upon the life of the President he shall be punished in a certain way. Now, supposing some poor, deluded, half-witted, and defeated officeholder should shoot at the President and not touch him at all. Under this amendment, what must occur? The jury must send him to the penitentiary for life. In a case like the killing of President McKinley——

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. NEVIN. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. As I understand the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, it provides either imprisonment or death.

Mr. NEVIN. Oh, yes; the amendment provides that it must be either death or imprisonment for life. Now, suppose it was a poor, half-witted, defeated officeholder, a man like Guiteau, who, when he was hanged, was, in my judgment, a babbling idiot; and if it had not been that it was for the killing of the President of the United States for which he suffered it would have been a disgrace to the jurisprudence of any State in this country to hang him.

Now, suppose a man like Guiteau or some man of that kind shoots at the President and misses him. The jury may not want to send him to the penitentiary for life, and may not want to hang him. Under that amendment what can they do? Can they find him guilty and give him ten or twenty years or five years in the penitentiary? No; they must either sentence him to be hanged or to the penitentiary for life. If it was a case like that of the infamous attack of Czolgosz on McKinley, then I would be with you; but if you are legislating for all classes of people for all time and under all circumstances, then I am against it, and I ask you to consider that you are putting upon the statute books here something that will reach all classes of people under all circumstances. [Applause.]

Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment which I have offered and to offer in place of it this amendment: In section 4, line 15, after the word "commit," insert the words "the offense defined in section 1 of this act shall suffer death or imprisonment for life, as the jury may recommend," and then strike out the word "one" in the sixth line.

Mr. RAY of New York I do not understand the effect of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts will send the amendment to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. RAY of New York. There is an amendment already pending that we have not voted on.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment he offered, and offer a different one, varying somewhat in phraseology.

Mr. RAY of New York. To that I object, unless we understand the debate is closed and that we take a vote. If that is the understanding, I have no objection. We have debated on this subject nearly half an hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment he offered, and amend the amendment, differing in phraseology. Is there objection?

Mr. RAY of New York. There is objection unless it be understood——

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the original amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers a second amendment to the proposition, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 4 so that it will read as follows:
"That any person who attempts to commit the offense defined in section 1 of this act shall suffer death or imprisonment for life, as the jury may recommend, and any person who attempts to commit either of the offenses defined in sections 2 and 3 of this act shall be imprisoned not less than ten years."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. RAY of New York. Let us have a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 42, noes 43.

Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. POWERS] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] will take their places as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 51; noes 62.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of line 17, page 4, the following:
"And may be imprisoned for any longer term, in the discretion of the court."

Mr. OLMSTED. I offer that amendment, because I fear that as the statute now reads a person convicted of an offense can not be sentenced for a longer term than ten years, which is the minimum and only term fixed in this bill. This section as it now reads provides that the guilty person shall be imprisoned for "not less than ten years." The ordinary form of expression in such statutes is not less than so many, nor more than a certain number of years, thus fixing a minimum and authorizing a maximum, leaving it in the discretion of the court to impose any term between the two. Personally, I am not familiar with any statute which merely fixes the minimum without in any way conferring jurisdiction or discretion to impose any longer term.

Mr. RAY of New York. I will assure the gentleman.

Mr. OLMSTED. Do not assure me until I conclude. It may be that there are authorities for the language used—authorities that would justify the imposition of a longer term than the statute names—but I should be glad to see them. If there are, then my amendment is not necessary; but in any event it can do no harm, and it makes the matter certain.

But it seems to me, without having stopped to consult the authorities, that a statute which merely fixes the minimum term of imprisonment—which merely says "shall be imprisoned not less than ten years"—that would be held to be the maximum as well as the minimum in the absence of any legislation allowing the court power to impose any longer term. Now, in section 7 this bill authorizes a maximum at twenty-five years' imprisonment if any person shall harbor a person guilty of one of these offenses. It seems to me that we ought not to be less specific in giving the court discretion to impose a term of more than ten years upon the guilty person himself.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. OLMSTED. Division.

The committee divided, and there were—ayes 14, noes 45.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out section 4.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That any person who, while engaged in an unlawful attempt to inflict grievous bodily harm upon the President of the United States, or the Vice-President of the United States, or any officer entitled by law to succeed to the Presidency, while he is engaged in the performance of his official duties, or because of his official character, or because of any of his official acts or omissions, inflicts injuries on such President, Vice-President, or other officer which cause death, shall be imprisoned for life. If such injuries do not cause death, such offender shall be imprisoned not less than five years.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of making an inquiry of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee. The first section provides that if anybody kills the President of the United States he must be hung for it. In this section of the bill it is provided that if anybody kills the President of the United States by inflicting injuries from which death results he gets imprisonment for life. I would like to know why. The result is the same in both cases.

This section provides that if anybody inflicts serious bodily harm upon the President, and if such injuries result in his death, then the perpetrator shall be imprisoned for life. I would like to know the difference between taking a pistol and killing the President and beating him with a club and injuring him so that he dies in six months.

Mr. GILBERT. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. PALMER. Certainly.

Mr. GILBERT. You will also observe by section 4 that an attempt to kill is punished by not exceeding ten years, and in the latter part of section 5 an attempt not resulting in death is punished by a term not exceeding five years. There is conflict between this section of the bill and the other features of the bill.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. If the gentleman will allow me, I think in that provision perhaps the intention to kill does not exist.

Mr. PALMER. What earthly consequence is it? If the man who assails the President of the United States, intending only to inflict serious bodily harm, inflicts wounds which result in death, is it not as much murder as though he shot him with a gun? The whole purpose of the act is not so much to protect the individual as to protect the Government. What we are trying to do is to preserve the people of the United States from the calamity attending an assassination of the Chief Executive.

Mr. COWHERD. Does not this bill change what would be murder under the common law into imprisonment for life? If I understand the provisions of the bill, the criticism that the gentleman is making is that the person who makes the assault on the President intends to inflict grievous bodily harm.

Mr. PALMER. If death ensued, then he would commit manslaughter.

Mr. COWHERD. If he was in the act of committing a felony and the act results in death, it is murder in the first degree. While there may not be an intent to kill, if there is an intent to commit the felony, and in the effort to commit the felony death results, it is murder in the first degree.

Mr. PALMER. How can a man who makes an assault intend to commit a felony unless he intends to kill?

Mr. COWHERD. If he intends to do him grievous bodily harm.

Mr. PALMER. That is not necessarily a felony. The whole purpose of this bill is, Mr. Chairman, to preserve to the people of the United States the right to have their President live, and I would like to know whether it makes any difference whether he is killed by a bullet from a pistol or whether he is injured in some other way and lingers along several weeks and then dies. In one case under this bill the punishment is death, and in the other case it is imprisonment for life.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, only one word. In all civilized communities there is a distinction made between killing a man with an intent and purpose to effect his death and a killing without any such intent or purpose—an intent to injure where there is no intent to kill, but incidentally or otherwise you go too far and kill. We have maintained a distinction in fixing the punishment in cases of this kind. If a man intends to commit a crime while he is engaged in the commission of a felony, you might hang the offender. He is just as bad as though he had accomplished his purpose. Anyone knows that is true, but the laws of all civilized communities and of all States make a distinction. We have followed that idea, and it is followed in the Senate bill.

If a man only intends to assault the President and not to kill him, the punishment may be imprisonment for life or a much shorter term, depending on the circumstances. That is left to the discretion of the court, and we believe the courts of this country are so intelligent that they can be trusted to impose the proper penalty when a man is convicted to give him such a sentence as he ought to receive. The distinction between the first section and this one is that the first section puts in the words knowingly and purposely kill, etc. This section provides for those cases where there is no purpose or intent to kill, but simply an attempt to inflict grievous bodily harm. I may add that there is no State in the Union nor a civilized country on the face of the earth to-day that inflicts anything more than life imprisonment for this offense, except when in the commission of a felony a life is taken.

Mr. RUCKER. The gentleman is mistaken about the law.

Mr. RAY of New York. I am not mistaken. I have taken every statute and have collated them. The man that states to the contrary does not know exactly what he is talking about.

Mr. RUCKER. The gentleman from New York does not know all the law of this country by himself alone. [Laughter.]

Mr. RAY of New York. I understand that, but we have taken all the statutes and compiled them——

Mr. RUCKER. The gentleman's compilation may be all right, but his construction is wrong. I know the universal law is that a man is presumed to intend the usual consequences of his own act, and where he uses a deadly weapon, he is presumed to intend the natural and usual consequences of that weapon.

Mr. RAY of New York. Now, Mr. Chairman, I concede that, and I think that debate on this amendment is exhausted, and I call for a vote.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my formal amendment, and now I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the words "imprisonment for life," in line 5, and insert the words "suffer death."

Mr. PALMER. The point of the whole business is this: It hurts the people of the United States just as much to strike the President of the United States with a club, the injury inflicted resulting in death, as it does to kill him with a pistol.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. PALMER. Yes, sir.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. Is it not the rule in all our courts that the intent characterizes and fixes the crime?

Mr. PALMER. Undoubtedly.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. Now, in the common law or the statutory law or otherwise has it ever been laid down as a proposition that you can punish a man for murder in the first degree without there having been an intent to kill?

Mr. PALMER. Certainly not.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. And does the gentleman think it right to provide the same character of punishment for a man who intends to kill the President as for the man who has no such intent?

Mr. RUCKER. May I ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question?

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. I should like to have an answer to my question, and then I will answer the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER].

Mr. PALMER. I think that in this case the intent and purpose of this bill is not only to preserve the life of the President, but to preserve the rights of the people of the United States and to deter assassination by severe punishment.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. Does not the gentleman think it would be a monstrous law which would put the man who had not the intent to kill in the same category with the assailant who had that intent?

Mr. PALMER. No, I do not; because the purpose of this bill is not altogether to provide a punishment for the murder of an individual. It hurts the people of the United States just as much to have the President killed by somebody who makes an assault not for the purpose of killing him, but for the purpose of inflicting "grievous bodily harm," as it does to have him killed by a man who intends to kill him.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. The death of the President might be the result of the malpractice of a physician. Does the gentleman think that under such circumstances the physician ought to be punished by death?

Mr. PALMER. Does the gentleman think that under this section a physician at whose hands the President had suffered malpractice would be indictable?

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. That is not the question at all.

Mr. PALMER. That is my question.

Mr. RUCKER. Let me ask the gentleman from Tennessee how is the "intent" of a criminal proven?

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. By all of the facts and circumstances surrounding the transaction.

Mr. RUCKER. Where a man uses unlawfully a deadly weapon upon another, does not the law presume that he intended that death should follow?

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. There is nothing at all said about that in this provision.

Mr. RUCKER. It says:

That any person who while engaged in an unlawful attempt to inflict grievous bodily harm upon the President of the United States, etc.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. The intent to kill is not presumed; only malice is presumed at common law.

Mr. RUCKER. The intent is presumed where a deadly weapon is used—one likely to produce death or bodily harm—and under such circumstances the law conclusively presumes that it was the intent of the assailant to produce death, and he is dealt with accordingly. How else can you prove a man's intent?

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. There is nothing in section 5 of this bill which says anything about a deadly weapon.

Mr. RUCKER. The language is:

Unlawful intent to inflict grievous bodily harm.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. Let me answer the question. The language of the bill is—

That any person who, while engaged in an unlawful attempt to inflict grievous bodily harm.

That is the language of the bill. The question which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] has put to me is not a practical one; it is a suppositious one entirely.

Mr. RUCKER. What sort of "grievous bodily harm" is meant by the bill? What was in the mind of the committee?

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. The gentleman's question is not a practical question, so far as this matter is concerned, and I can not answer what was in the mind of the committee.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Chairman, nine-tenths of all the talk that has been heard in this House about this bill is utterly futile, and none more so than that which has been uttered on this particular section. From this remark I except the suggestion made by my colleague from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER]. Now, the truth about the whole thing is that the severity of punishment militates against inflicting any punishment at all. Every man in this House who has had any experience in the practice of criminal law knows that that is absolutely true.

Now, gentlemen are talking here about a case which I do not believe ever happened or ever will happen with respect to a President of the United States. That is the reason the talk is futile. Nobody is going to make an assault upon the President of the United States for the purpose of doing him great bodily harm, unless there is an intention to kill him.

Mr. PALMER. Then what is the use of this section?

Mr. CLARK. I do not see that there is very much use in it as to the President, because this is true (and we may as well recognize it): The court, and the jury, and everybody that has anything to do with trying a man who has killed the President of the United States will resolve every doubt in favor of the prosecution, instead of resolving such doubt, as usual, in favor of the accused. But this section does not apply to the President only. It applies to the Vice-President, it also applies to members of the Cabinet who may succeed to the Presidency, and I can readily conceive why, under some circumstances, a rational man might want to give a member of the Cabinet a thrashing—under some gross insult or provocation—though he would not undertake such a thing upon the President. Suppose a man did attempt to thrash a member of the Cabinet when the man concluded he needed a thrashing, and that he inflicted accidentally more punishment than he intended to inflict? Suppose he hit him with his fist? The presumption of law is that the human fist is not a deadly weapon.

I do not know whether that presumption would have applied to John L. Sullivan's fist when "Sully" was in his prime; but suppose the average citizen should get into a controversy with a member of the Cabinet, if this bill should pass, and the member of the Cabinet insulted him outrageously and the man struck him a crack with his fist and there was more power in his fist than he supposed there was or the physical condition of the member of the Cabinet was frail when his assailant did not know it, and he killed him, it does not comport with either common sense or justice to hang the man under any such circumstances as that. Now, every member wants to vote for a good deal of this bill, but there is no sort of sense in loading it up and making it so bloody that a rational man can not vote for it, and while nobody appointed me to defend the Judiciary Committee in this House, my impression is, with all due deference to everybody, that the Judiciary Committee, after studying over that section as long as it did came to about as reasonable a conclusion as we can arrive at here in the hurly-burly of the House with a storm going on outside. You will never have any application of this section except to hang somebody for knocking somebody else down.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, I call for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken, and the amendment rejected.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding at the end of line 5, page 5, the following:
"And may be imprisoned any longer term, at the discretion of the court."

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, this section as it now stands provides that if anybody makes an assault upon the President and the President dies the offender may be imprisoned for life, but if the President does not die, then for "not less than five years." But it nowhere authorizes imprisonment for more than five years. Now, I say, and I challenge the chairman of the Judiciary Committee to point me to any authorities to the contrary, that the extent of punishment under that act, if the President does not die, is five years; I think that would not be satisfactory to the members of this committee.

It certainly would not be satisfactory to the people of the United States. It would not be satisfactory to anybody if it were known that under this bill an assault upon the President of that character, the President maimed perhaps for life, his mind gone perhaps, or the assault resulting in any one of a thousand other ills that might afflict him for the balance of his life, would subject the offender to imprisonment for only five years.

I do not suppose this amendment will pass for two reasons. I do not offer it to embarrass the bill. I am in favor of the bill and desire to make it as nearly perfect as possible. The chairman of the committee will concede that my amendment would not hurt the bill, and yet there seems to be a sort of pride of opinion in not having a word of it changed. Therefore the Judiciary Committee will oppose it. There are a good many gentlemen on the opposite side of the House who do not want the bill perfected, because they do not want it passed at all, and therefore they will vote against the amendment, but I am going to do my duty and propose this amendment, which leaves it in the discretion of the court to give the offender a longer term than five years.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania seems to labor under the impression that this language would not permit imprisonment for more than five years: "Such offender shall be imprisoned not less than five years."

Mr. OLMSTED. Where is the authority for more than five years?

Mr. RAY of New York. Now, if I could bring a law library down for the instruction of the gentleman, or if I had thought it necessary I would have done it, but on such a simple proposition as that I do not think it is necessary.

Mr. OLMSTED. If you will bring the whole law library, you will not find any authority to contradict my position nor to sustain your contention that when you simply say "such offender shall be imprisoned not less than five years," you confer any power upon the court to sentence him for any longer period.

Mr. RAY of New York. The gentleman says that, and I tell him that the Committee on the Judiciary had that language under consideration. We had language in there saying that it should not be for less than five nor more than ten, and then we looked up and found the decisions——

Mr. OLMSTED. Where are they? Show me one.

Mr. RAY of New York. All I can say is that I do not think the gentleman could understand it if I did show it to him. We found the decisions, and then we struck out that language that the gentleman suggests as surplusage, in order to make the bill brief.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Does the gentleman understand that any maximum punishment to be applied here is within the discretion of the jury?

Mr. RAY of New York. I understand that it is in the discretion of the court, not the jury.

Mr. SNODGRASS. I mean of the court. And any maximum above five years is within the discretion of the court.

Mr. RAY of New York. He is to be imprisoned, in the discretion of the court, for such term as the court inflicts, not longer than life and not less than five years.

Mr. OLMSTED. But it does not say so.

Mr. RAY of New York. It is not necessary to say so.

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to ask the gentleman if he would have any objection to inserting "for a term"—shall be imprisoned for a term not less than five years? I think if the gentleman did that it would clear up the objection of my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED].

Mr. LANHAM. In my State the penalty for murder in the second degree is for any time not less than five years.

Mr. OLMSTED. In the discretion of the court? That would certainly not authorize more than five years.

Mr. LANHAM. In the discretion of the jury. The penalty there is fixed by the jury.

Mr. RAY of New York. This is the language of the Revised Statutes of the United States in more than a dozen instances.

Mr. OLMSTED. I should like to see one of them.

Mr. RAY of New York. Take the Revised Statutes and read them as we have.

Mr. SNODGRASS. I want to ask the chairman of the Judiciary Committee if he thinks imprisonment could be imposed by the judge for any time beyond the period of five years under this provision?

Mr. RAY of New York. I have already answered that question.

Mr. SNODGRASS. The confusion was so great that I did not understand the gentleman.

Mr. RAY of New York. I say, under the language of that section, the offender if convicted can be imprisoned for the term of his natural life, and not less than five years, in the discretion of the judge. I say, that is the language in many instances in the Revised Statutes to-day.

The question being taken on the amendment, it was rejected.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to strike out, in line 20, after the word "or," all of line 21 and the word "Presidency" in line 22; also, in line 25, strike out the words "Vice-President or other officer," and insert after the word "shall" the words "suffer death;" strike out "be imprisoned for life."

That would leave the section applicable only to an assault upon the President of the United States for the purpose of inflicting grievous bodily harm. In the event of the death of the President as the result of such an assault, the person committing the crime would then suffer the penalty of death. Now, the previous section here protects the Cabinet officers. Section 2 provides that—

Any person who unlawfully, purposely, or knowingly kills the Vice-President of the United States or any officer of the United States entitled by law—

And so forth, so that this section would then be for the purpose of punishing only the man who assaults the President with intent to do grievous bodily harm, and in the event of the death of the President as the result of such assault he would then suffer death as the consequence of his act, leaving the rest of the section just as it is reported by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Minnesota, so that the committee can understand what the question is.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 20, after the word "or," strike out the words "the Vice-President of the United States or any officer entitled by law to succeed to the Presidency." In line 25 strike out the words "Vice-President or other officer." In line 1, page 5, strike out the words "be imprisoned for life" and insert "suffer death."

Mr. TAWNEY. Now, just one word more on that question. In the event of the adoption of this section as reported by the committee, if an assault is made upon the President of the United States while in the discharge of his official duty—that is the language of the bill—from which assault the President dies, then the only punishment that can be inflicted upon him is life imprisonment; and in the event of the recovery of the President from that assault, no matter if it leaves him maimed or otherwise physically disabled for life, the punishment would be only five years. I recall, as does every member of this committee, the circumstances that arose soon after the shooting of President McKinley at Buffalo, when it was supposed that he would certainly recover from the effect of the assault made upon him in that city.

Then the question arose as to what punishment could be inflicted upon the man who had committed this assault with a deadly weapon with intent to kill. It was discovered that he could be imprisoned for only ten years under the laws of the State of New York, and all over this broad land there arose a wave of indignation because the laws of this country would not permit of more severe punishment. Universal indignation prevailed because the President of the United States had been assaulted with intent to kill and his assailant could be punished only by imprisonment for a term of ten years. The indignation of the people, or their resentment, was not because the President, as a man, had been assaulted, but because in that assault a blow had been struck at our Government, at organized society, and the punishment for an offense of that kind and of that magnitude was wholly inadequate. It was because of this that there came from all over the country a demand for Federal legislation that would afford protection to the President as President, as the Chief Executive of this nation, and not as an individual unit of organized society. I think this amendment ought to be adopted, so that the evil and criminal minded—that all—may know that he who assaults the President of the United States with intent to do him "grievous" bodily harm, and he dies from the effect of such assault, will assault the nation and will forfeit his life as a punishment for the serious offense thus committed.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GILBERT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to section 5. After the word "death," in line 25, insert the words "within a year and a day."

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 25, page 4, after the word "death," insert the words "within a year and a day."

Mr. GILBERT. Now, Mr. Chairman, we have a statute in this bill, if it is enacted into law, which is applied to two different crimes. A man may commit an unlawful assault upon the President or the Vice-President or any of these officers that will either result in death or it will not. If it results in death, we try him, and he is hung, under section 1, and under section 5 he is sent to the penitentiary. If it does not result in death, we try him, under section 4, and we imprison him for a term not exceeding ten years, and we can try him under section 5 and imprison him for a term of not more that five years; so we have two laws, both denouncing the same offense. Now, if the man dies twenty years after the infliction of the injury upon him, he is sent to prison for life under section 1.

Now, ordinarily there is a common-law period in which the death shall occur. The common-law period was one year and a day, so that if the malicious assault resulted in the death of the President in a year and a day he may be punished by death. If he lives longer than a year and a day, or any other period that may be prescribed, then under section 4 he would be subject to be imprisoned for not less than ten years. So this statute ought to prescribe a term in which the death should result from the infliction of the injury.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LANHAM. I move to strike out section 5.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That any person who knowingly harbors, conceals, or aids, with intent that he may avoid or escape from arrest, trial, conviction, or punishment, any person who has committed either of the offenses mentioned in the preceding sections of this act shall be imprisoned for not less than one nor more than twenty-five years.

Mr. OLMSTED. I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out the words "nor more than twenty-five years."

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment because, if the judgment of the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary is correct, these words are entirely superfluous, as it is entirely within the discretion of the court to impose such punishment as it deems necessary or proper. I do not agree with him and offer this simply to test his sincerity. I want to say, in addition to what I said before, that I again challenge the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, or any other gentleman, to point me to one authority where an act which simply fixed the minimum imprisonment and did not express any authority to impose a longer term was held to justify the imposition by the court of any longer term of imprisonment than the single term mentioned in the act as the minimum.

My friend says the Revised Statutes are full of acts imposing the penalty in such language. I have looked them over hastily. Here is the volume. I hand it to the gentleman and again challenge him to show me one instance where imprisonment was ever provided without fixing more than a minimum term. Very frequently the term is provided for not more than a certain number of years. That would, of course, justify a sentence for a lesser number. Generally both the maximum and minimum are named; but there is not in the Revised Statutes, so far as I can find, any instance where the statute simply imposes imprisonment for "not less than" a certain number of years.

Mr. RAY of New York. If the gentleman says that he has looked over the criminal statutes of the United States, he is in error. No man can look over the criminal statutes and apply himself diligently in less than one whole day.

Mr. OLMSTED. No; and if the gentleman will apply himself diligently for a hundred years, he will not find one case where the Revised Statutes fix simply a minimum without also naming a maximum or authorizing a term longer than the minimum.

Mr. RAY of New York. I am not yielding to the gentleman. The gentleman has shown his fairness in debate in this class of legislation by solemnly asserting here what the gentleman from New York said was not true then, that there was no such statute in the language we have used. Now, let us see what is the language we have used.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to call the attention of the gentleman from New York to the fact that the gentleman from Pennsylvania is constructively assumed to be occupying the floor in favor of his amendment.

Mr. RAY of New York. Oh, I beg pardon.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York has not asked to be recognized, nor has he been recognized.

Mr. OLMSTED. The gentleman having shown his fairness in debate, again challenging him to find in the Revised Statutes of the United States one such case as I have referred to and as he asserts abound there, I will withdraw my amendment, so as not to delay matters.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That any person who advocates, advises, or teaches the duty, necessity, or propriety of the unlawful killing or assaulting of one or more of the officers (either of specific individuals or officers generally) of the Government of the United States, or of the government of any civilized nation, because of his or their official character, or who openly, willfully, and deliberately justifies such killing or assaulting, with intent to cause the commission of any of the offenses specified in the first nine sections of this act, shall be fined not less than $500 nor more than $5,000, or imprisoned not less than one nor more than twenty years, or both.

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 5, line 22, after the word "act," strike out to the end of the paragraph and insert the following:

"Shall upon conviction by a proper court thereof be considered a dangerous lunatic, and their property shall be made subject to the court which administers the estate of persons of unsound mind."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Chairman, I consider that the people of the United States are principally, as I said a few days ago, concerned in preventing the crime that resulted in the death of President McKinley. The best way to prevent a repetition of this kind is to stamp out the preaching of these doctrines and by making the punishment as severe and as distasteful as possible.

To imprison, Mr. Chairman, very many of these people who indulge in the teachings of anarchy is rather what they want than the reverse. They have the chance of promulgating their infamous doctrines with those with whom they are thrown in contact in prisen and they come forth as martyrs and are looked to as martyrs by those who have the same principles as they have.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there can be nothing so distasteful to a man as to be considered an insane person and a man of unsound mind. There can be no punishment as great. My amendment reads that upon conviction by the common courts thereafter at all times that man is to be considered as a dangerous lunatic and should be incarcerated accordingly. I have nothing more to say on the subject except to request that the members of the House and the Judiciary Committee give this matter some consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out section 8.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama moves to strike out section 8.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, the reason I move to strike out this section is that it applies to a great many people that it is not necessary to protect, and I think if left in the bill would be very dangerous and a means of harassing a great many innocent people.

Section 8 provides:

SEC. 8. That any person who advocates, advises, or teaches the duty, necessity, or propriety of the unlawful killing or assaulting of one or more of the officers (either of specific individuals or officers generally) of the Government of the United States, or of the government of any civilized nation, because of his or their official character, or who openly, willfully, and deliberately justifies such killing or assaulting, with intent to cause the commission of any of the offenses specified in the first nine sections of this act, shall be fined not less than five hundred nor more than five thousand dollars, or imprisoned not less than one nor more than twenty years, or both.

Now, that says "any officer of the Government." It does not limit it to the President of the United States, the Vice-President of the United States, or a Cabinet officer, but it goes all the way down the line from the President of the United States, and includes a fourth-class postmaster. If one of the citizens of your district, or my district, goes into a fourth-class post-office in this country and becomes involved in a controversy with the postmaster in his town in reference to the handling of the mail and assaults him, growing out of that controversy, he can be taken to the United States Court and tried and convicted under this section for this act. There is no law ever been attempted to be passed by the Congress of the United States since the repeal of the alien and sedition laws that, in my opinion, goes further toward imperiling the liberties of individual citizens and allowing the Government of the United States to go into the homes of the citizens of this country with its strong arm and interfere with local self-government for the protection of the citizens than this section of this act.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. It not only does that, but it says that any man who justifies it shall be punished.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes, it goes further than that, as my colleague states; and it not only says that the man involved in the assault shall be punished, but his neighbor who is standing around and says that the man who assaulted the postmaster was justified in it, and commends him for the assault, he can also be dragged before the Federal courts and punished for that.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield to me for a suggestion?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. In my judgment, this is one of the best provisions in this bill. I am against some of the features of the bill, but I think this is the best one in it. The gentleman from Alabama is mistaken in his construction of the section, it seems to me. Any man who justifies an assault on a fourth-class postmaster is not a principal offender under this section, unless that justification is with the intent to cause the commission of any of the offenses justified in the first nine sections of this act. The distinction is an exceedingly broad one and well defined. So the justification must not only be to the act itself, but it must be that he intended the commission of one of the offenses specified.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course, that has got to be so.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. If the gentleman will pardon me further, I think with that qualification there is less objectionable features to this section than to any other section in the bill that has been read.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the assault is made by an individual citizen on a postmaster in the discharge of his official duties——

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. It does not read that way.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, read it.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Let the gentleman read it himself, and see if he finds it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It says "with intent to cause the commission of any of the offenses specified in the first nine sections of this act."

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Well, that does not justify the gentleman's conclusion.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does not the act provide that if he assaults anyone in the official discharge of his duty?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. No, it does not; by reason of his official character. The act provides, in substance, that if anybody preaches the murder of an official of the United States Government by reason of the fact that he is an official, he shall be punished, and we say that he ought to be punished, and we do not think, with all due respect to my friend from Alabama, that it is an innocent act on the part of any individual to advise such killing.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It goes further than that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. RAY of New York. With the permission of the Chair, I will rise to oppose the amendment and yield two minutes to the gentleman from Alabama.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, that may be done.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to state why I object to this section. Of course if any one should advocate the killing of a postmaster it would be an awful offense; but why should the offender in such a case be dragged before a Federal court for trial? Is a postmaster any better or any higher than any other citizen, or is the Government of the United States so much involved that we must reach out to protect all these small officers? I agree that such a provision may be proper as applied to the President of the United States.

But the worst part of this section is that with reference to assaulting one or more of these officers. Suppose a postmaster gets into some trouble with his neighbors, and some individual advises the assaulting of that officer because there has been some falling out between this individual and the postmaster in regard to the handling of the mail. Or the same supposition may be made in regard to a deputy marshal or any other minor officer of the United States. In such a case, under this provision of the pending bill, the person accused must be dragged before a Federal court, it may be hundreds of miles distant. He may be entirely innocent, but he may be obliged to go with his witnesses hundreds of miles in order to prove his innocence. It seems to me there is no necessity whatever for the enactment of this provision, and I believe that in most cases it would be used as a means of oppression. That is why I oppose it.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD to strike out section 8—

The CHAIRMAN. The noes seem to have it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask for a division.

The question being again taken, there were—ayes 22, noes 58.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. McCALL. I move to strike out in line 16 of this section the words "or assaulting," and also to strike out the same words in lines 20 and 21. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the Committee on the Judiciary has not shown its usual care in the preparation of this provision. This is a very carefully considered bill as a whole. I think that as a piece of legal drafting it displays remarkable ability.

But this eighth section, as it now stands, may open the way for proceedings which I think we would not deliberately sanction. Suppose, for instance, an individual has advised another that it is proper for him to thrash a certain fourth-class postmaster, or, if he has done it, tells him that he has done right, and that he ought to do it again. Such a case may be brought within the provisions of this section; and they might apply to very many thousand minor officers who go among the people and are liable to get in trouble with them. It seems to me to include such a provision in the bill would extend it beyond its proper scope.

As to teaching murder as a cult—advocating the destruction of government by destroying the agents of government—that is a very serious offense. But this bill, in addition to providing a punishment in such a case, goes on and suggests a creed which I never heard of any anarchist teaching—that is, advising the assaulting or whipping of some officer of the Government. It strikes me that the provision embraced in this section is too broad. It applies to a great many officers; and, appying to so many, it seems to me it should be more limited. I have hesitated to offer any amendment, but at the same time I did not know how I could get my views before the House without suggesting an amendment of this kind.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. LONG having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. B. F. BARNES, one of his secretaries, who informed the House of Representatives that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

On June 7, 1902:

H. R. 4542. An act granting a pension to Eliza J. West;

H. R. 5248. An act granting a pension to Frances A. Tillotson;

H. R. 7397. An act granting a pension to Louisa White;

H. R. 9606. An act granting a pension to Charles Blitz;

H. R. 9794. An act granting an increase of pension to Zebulon A. Shipman;

H. R. 10782. An act granting a pension to Ole Steensland;

H. R. 12983. An act granting an increase of pension to Eleanor Emerson;
H. R. 13037. An act granting an increase of pension to Francis W. Anderton; and
H. R. 13614. An act granting an increase of pension to William H. White.

PROTECTION OF THE PRESIDENT.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL].

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 16 of section 8 strike out the words "or assaulting."
In lines 20 and 21 of the same section strike out the words "or assaulting."

The CHAIRMAN (having put the question on the amendment of Mr. MCCALL). The ayes appear to have it.

Mr. RAY of New York. I call for a division.

The question being again taken, there were—ayes 63, noes 30.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. That any person who conspires with any other person or persons, or requests, advises, or encourages any other person or persons to unlawfully assault or kill, within or without the United States, the chief executive or chief magistrate of any other civilized nation having an organized government, because of his official character, shall be punished as follows: If an attempt to commit such act is made and the death of any person results therefrom, such offender shall suffer death. If such attempt does not result in death, such offender shall be fined not less than five hundred nor more than five thousand dollars, or be imprisoned not less than five nor more than twenty-five years, or both. If such attempt is not made, such offender shall be fined not less than five hundred nor more than five thousand dollars, or be imprisoned not less than one nor more than five years, or both.

Mr. KLEBERG. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lines 2 and 3 of section 9 strike out the words "or requests, advises, or encourages any other person or persons."

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Chairman, I think this whole section is foreign to the purpose of this bill. The purpose of the bill is to protect the President, the Vice-President, and such officers as may be in line of lawful succession to the Presidency. This section confines itself entirely to foreign rulers, and for that reason I am against the whole section; but, fearing that possibly the section will be adopted, I want to strike out these words and make it less objectionable. If these words are adopted, it would read simply in this way, that any person who conspired with any other person or persons, etc., to kill. That would simply leave the law of conspiracy, and that certainly ought to be sufficient in a case of this kind.

Where a party enters into a conspiracy the law is well defined as to what conspiracy means and what acts are defined as constituting conspiracy, but these other terms which are placed in this section independently of the conspiracy would make an individual liable who would simply encourage innocently and indirectly an assault upon a foreign potentate whether he entered into a conspiracy or not. Now, what does the word "encourage" mean? It means, in its ordinary signification, to incite to action. Now, that, in my opinion, would, under the power of judicial construction, mean that if any newspaper editor or if any public speaker at a public meeting would inveigh against a throne or a monarchy and use such intemperate language, possibly, as thereby to incite to action someone on the other side of the ocean, some crank, to make an assault upon some crowned head or upon some foreign ruler, then that editor or public speaker could be punished on American soil and be held responsible for such an offense although he had no intention that his language should have that effect.

I say that such a construction, if it can be made, and I believe there is danger that such a construction might be placed upon these terms, would operate as an infringement upon and abridgement to the liberty of speech and freedom of the press. I believe that it would be worse than all the alien and sedition laws of old, because those sedition laws extended only over the domain of our own country; they affected only the conduct of people in our own country, and the words themselves which define sedition had an open and well-defined meaning, and a legal signification. Not so with these words. Their intention seems to be vague and veiled, and while I say that I do not wish for a moment to reflect upon the learning or the integrity of any of the members of the Judiciary Committee, but by some reason, by some unknown influence, these words have crept into this section, and I believe it is one of the most dangerous sections in the whole bill, because it must be an attack, covert attack though it be, upon the liberty of speech and the freedom of the press.

It is a well-known fact that foreign governments are inimical to the freedom of the press and the freedom of speech which obtains in the United States, and I think if this section passes in its present state, that it will place under the surveillance and control of foreign rulers the citizens and the rights and liberties of the citizens of this country. In other words, it would place under the police regulations of any foreign nation the conduct and rights of the people of the United States.

Now, there is a purpose. I know there is a motive behind this section, and I do not say that it is an improper motive at all, but there is an effort existing between our Government and the governments of foreign nations to hunt down the anarchists, and that part of it I believe in and fully approve as far as it can be lawfully done. I do not care how much you legally chase the anarchist, but in doing so we should be cautious not to infringe upon the liberties of our own people, or intrench on the liberty of speech and the freedom of the press.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the gentlemen of the committee to this section:

Any person who conspires with any other person or persons, or requests, advises, or encourages any other person or persons to unlawfully assault or kill, within or without the United States, the Chief Magistrate, etc.

Now, you can not do all that unless you have done some act, and there is no danger that any jury would ever unjustly or improperly convict any person. Conspiracy is well defined and well understood.

Mr. KLEBERG. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAY of New York. The gentleman has had five minutes. If I had plenty of time I would yield gladly. This applies to conspiracies here to commit offenses abroad. The section is intended and the purpose is to break up these meetings of anarchists in the United States which teach the commission of murder abroad. We have disagreed with the Senate and add that provision, and think that if we break up these conspiracies here in the United States to murder abroad, and punish the conspirators when we can, that we do all that is necessary to do in that regard. The crime is committed here, for it consists in the conspiracy, not the murder.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. We do not want to make this a breeding place of anarchy.

Mr. RAY of New York. We do not want to make or permit this country to be a breeding place for anarchy, and this section as it is met the approval of every member of the Judiciary Committee without exception. There is one amendment which I desire to offer as a committee amendment, which would make the section clearer, and that will be in line 7, to make it read: "If an attempt to commit such act is made as the result thereof;" that is, as the result of the conspiracy. That will make it definite and certain. Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to say more.

Mr. SNODGRASS rose.

Mr. RAY of New York. Does the gentleman from Tennessee desire to ask a question?

Mr. SNODGRASS. Yes. What authority has the gentleman found for providing against offenses against foreign nations?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. It is not an offense against a foreign nation.

Mr. RAY of New York. This is not an offense against foreign nations. It is an offense committed within the United States. It is a conspiracy formed in the United States to commit a crime abroad. Now, the offense which is committed in the United States is the formation of the conspiracy here.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Against whom is the offense committed?

Mr. RAY of New York. Oh, if the conspiracy is carried out, it is against foreign rulers.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Against foreign rulers?

Mr. RAY of New York. But it is clearly within our power. The essence of the crime is the conspiracy.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Suppose every foreign ruler were destroyed, would that destroy our Government?

Mr. RAY of New York. Oh, not at all; but, you know, this section is not for the protection of any particular individual. This section is for the purpose of breaking up these nests of anarchists, these meetings of anarchists in this country.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. It is justified under the principles of international law.

Mr. RAY of New York. This is justified under our power to enact international law. Now, these anarchists come here or are within the United States. They get together and teach the propriety or the duty or the necessity of murdering monarchs abroad. You will recollect that King Humbert of Italy was murdered as the result of a plot which was concocted, I think, in New Jersey.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. In Paterson, N. J.

Mr. RAY of New York. In Paterson, N. J.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. And the assassin came from this country.

Mr. RAY of New York. The assassin came from this country. Now, it was to reach these plottings that this section was framed. There ought to be no objection to it. The Constitution of the United States provides that we have full power to define and punish piracy and offenses against the law of nations.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Except that we are not authorized to impose any limitation upon free speech.

Mr. RAY of New York. That is quite true; but what is free speech? You can not teach murder, you can not teach crime, you can not encourage crime under the pretense of free speech. We have covered that question in our report.

Mr. SNODGRASS. But the question is whether you are authorized——

Mr. RAY of New York (continuing). Free speech under the Constitution means free speech as it existed at the time of the adoption of that provision, and going back to the common law we find what free speech was. We find that you could not teach anything to break down government, you could not teach crime, you could not encourge it, you could not slander, you could not libel, and you can not to-day, and protect yourself under the theory that the Constitution gives you free speech or freedom of the press.

Mr. SNODGRASS. That may be true, if it be considered as subversive of our own Government and the power to protect our own Government. We might enact such a provision as that, but we are going beyond that, and by limiting free speech we are protecting the security of foreign governments.

Mr. RAY of New York. Not at all. We are preventing the formation of these plots and these conspiracies in the United States, which in themselves are crimes. Now, Mr. Chairman, has my time expired?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. This is not the section with reference to free speech. This is the section relating to conspiracy.

Mr. RAY of New York. I call for a vote.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. I want to be heard just for a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the pending amendment is exhausted, and the chairman of the committee calls for a vote.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I rise for the purpose of moving to strike out.

The CHAIRMAN. That can be done after the pending amendment is disposed of. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Texas.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. KLEBERG, the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. KLEBERG demanded a division.

The committee divided, and there were—ayes 32, noes 61.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out——

Mr. RAY of New York. Before the motion is made to strike out, I desire to perfect the section, and then the gentleman can make his motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Alabama after the section is perfected. The gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] is recognized.

Mr. RAY of New York. If the gentleman will let us get this perfected, then he shall have his chance.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. All right.

Mr. RAY of New York. On page 6, line 7, after the word "made," I move to insert the words "as the result thereof;" so that it will read: "If an attempt to commit such act is made as the result thereof."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, line 7, after the word "made," insert "as the result thereof."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I move to strike out all after the word "both," in line 12, page 6, to the end of the paragraph, down to the word "both," in line 16.

The CLERK. Strike out all after the word "both," in line 12, page 6, to the word "both," in line 16, which reads as follows:

If such attempt is not made, such offender shall be fined not less than five hundred nor more than five thousand dollars, or be imprisoned not less than one nor more than five years, or both.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Now, Mr. Chairman, if I understand the entire scope and meaning of the latter part of the section which is being considered, if an attempt is made to kill and death shall result, the party shall suffer death. If the attempt is made and it shall not result in death, then he shall be fined not less than $500 nor more than $5,000, and be imprisoned for not less than five nor more than twenty-five years, or both.

The paragraph to which I call attention is if no attempt is made whatsoever the man is liable to imprisonment for five years. Now I would like to know what does this part of the paragraph here refer to?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. The conspiracy.

Mr. RAY of New York. Will the gentleman allow me to answer that?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Of course I will.

Mr. RAY of New York. We put that in there, and it is an essential feature of the section. It is not likely that under that section there will be one offense committed in fifty years, except the offense of getting together and holding these meetings, teaching these doctrines, and making these conspiracies. Now, we want to break up these meetings. That is the object of this. It is at the conspiracy we strike. It will do no harm. You strike out these words and you will destroy the section, and leave it in and it will do no earthly harm. You will punish these men when they get together and hold these anarchistic meetings.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Then I will say to the chairman of the committee that I do not agree, most respectfully, with their view of the matter. While your object and purpose is good—I admit that to be the fact—it simply means this, as I understand it, that if I have discussed the matter, if I have talked about the matter of the death of Nicholas of Russia, if I have spoken of it in any way, shape, or form, and no act has been done, the conspirators have not done a thing, death has not resulted from it, no injury has resulted from it; but if I have conversed about it, it may be talked about or written about, why is not that an encouragement of it? It has resulted in no act of injury.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that this paragraph has an unlimited extent and meaning and that it does not affect either of the two paragraphs of this bill that we have passed. It is certainly too broad. It certainly leads to opening the door for annoyance to the citizen in every way that can be conceived, and I think, Mr. Chairman, that this part of this section 9 ought to be stricken out. If you can restrict its operation to the workings of anarchists, then I have no objection to make.

I am exceedingly anxious to reach in every possible way anarchy and anarchists. I desire to have this bill perfected in every possible way. I think that the country demands reasonable legislation on this subject. I shall do all I can to perfect this bill on the line of objections expressed by the minority on the committee. I am utterly opposed to all associations that harbor or foster anarchy. I have frankly given my views.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BELLAMY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to send forward an amendment to strike out the words "or encourages" in the second line of the section on the sixth page.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out the words "or encourages" in line 2, page 6.

Mr. BELLAMY. And insert between the words "requests" and "advises," the word "or."

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out in line 2, page 6, the words "or encourages," and insert between the words "requests" and "advises" the word "or."

Mr. BELLAMY. Now, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the offense described in section 9 implies generally that the act must be done willfully and with an intent. In other words, if a person conspires with any other person or persons to commit a crime, that implies that he willfully does it. If he requests a person to do it, that implies a mind and will. If he advises a person to do it, that implies willfulness. But when you come down to the word "encourages," that does not necessarily imply willfulness. An author may write a book, or a man may use language which unintentionally encourages another to do the act prohibited by law, and yet under this bill it is criminal.

I do not think that word "encourages" ought to be retained, because the section will be just as effective without it, and unless that be taken out of the section it might enable one citizen to vent his spite and spleen on another if he wishes to harass him by informing on him and saying that he said things or used language which "encouraged" the man to commit the act, when it was not intended that way. I hope, therefore, the committee will eliminate the expression "encourages," as it is too vague and may lead to oppression of the citizen. It is and should be the aim of the American Republic to give to the citizen the greatest amount of liberty of action and freedom of speech consistent with law and order. To unnecessarily and by forced construction curtail this right is an interference with one of the most sacred rights of an American, which lies at the very basis of his Government.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary a question. Can the gentleman tell me how anybody can criminally encourage this unlawful assault except by their conspiracy "to request and advise?" What is the use of that word "encourages?"

Mr. RAY of New York. Well, we discussed that in the committee. I will say that we are trying to break up these nests of conspirators that teach anarchy in the United States, and whether there is any additional force in the word "encourages" or not I do not know, and I do not pretend to know, but I think there is. It will do no harm; it may do good in that line. If there is anybody that does not want these nests of conspirators who teach anarchy broken up, they will want to make this provision weak. If we want this stopped, we will make the bill strong. That provision will never hit an American citizen who ought to live in the United States. Now, I am not going to talk about that word "encourages;" if the committee desires to strike it out, let them strike it out, and let us go on and pass the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I take it that everybody here, at any rate, wants to break up the nests of anarchists. I take it that every man in the world who takes pride in civilization must know that that civilization rests on an organized governmental basis. But I do not see how anybody could be guilty of criminal encouragement unless that encouragement grew out of either conspiring to commit the crime, or advising it, or requesting it. Now, let me illustrate——

Mr. NEVIN. Will the gentleman pardon me a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I suppose I will have to.

Mr. NEVIN. Suppose a person in sympathy with the anarchists, without advising, or without requesting, or without conspiring, sends him a sum of money to further his object?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I should think the proof of the fact that he had sent the sum of money for that purpose would be a conspiring.

Mr. NEVIN. Not necessarily. Under the legal definition of conspiracy, I take it that there must be some meeting, there must be some agreement together to do a certain thing. But suppose there was a family of anarchists and a person sends them a sum of money to aid in the commission of the crime?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. A man may aid and abet in the commission of a crime by furnishing money for the commission just as he would if he furnished a pistol. Now, I do not want to be interrupted further. I want to call the attention of the House to this fact: Some time ago you remember Mr. George Kennan wrote a series of articles for the Century Magazine criticising the Government in Russia and its conduct toward the Siberian exiles, and it was held in Russia that these articles could not be published in Russia because they were held to encourage anarchy and to encourage opposition to the Czar.

Now, I do not know what the court would hold that this indefinite word "encourages" means, but you need not tell me that you are certain when this man who wrote the book in favor of republican institutions for example, and against despotism whether czardom or kaiserdom was held to have encouraged the assassination of czars and kaisers. It seems to me the words "or encourages" ought to go out, first, because they are indefinite, and, secondly, because they do not mean anything, when it can be held that a man writing against despotism might be held to have encouraged the slaughter of despots.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, the committee are not particularly proud of these two words, and we will accept the amendment.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. Now, if the gentleman will pardon me, I have this amendment to suggest: I am in favor of this section, as I was of the other section of the bill, and I suggest that these words be inserted; that is, to insert on page 6, line 2, after the word "advises," the words "or does any other act with intent to procure;" so that the section would then read as follows:

SEC. 9. That any person who conspires with any other person or persons or requests, advises, or does any other act with intent to procure any other person or persons to assault or kill, etc.

Mr. RAY of New York. We will accept that. It is a little stronger than we had it before.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. I want to make it stronger.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Then I suggest that in the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina we leave out the word "or," which he proposed should be inserted between the words "requests" and "advises."

Mr. BELLAMY. I accept that modification.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina, to strike out the words "or encourages" in line 2, page 6.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, the gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 2, page 6, after the word "advises," insert the words "or does any other act with intent to procure," so that the section will read "that any person who conspires with any other person or persons, or requests, advises, or does any other act with intent to procure any other person," etc.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 10. That this act shall apply to all offenses hereinbefore specified when committed within any State or other place subject to the jurisdiction of the United States.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out this section. To my mind it is extremely objectionable. It is a provision which, if adopted by the House and enacted into law, will confer authority on the Federal courts to enter into the limits of a State and take jurisdiction heretofore never exercised by them.

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected; there being on a division (called for by Mr. LANHAM)—ayes 27, noes 77.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 11. That no person who disbelieves in or who is opposed to all organized government, or who is a member of or affiliated with any organization entertaining and teaching such disbelief in or opposition to all organized government, or who advocates or teaches the duty, necessity, or propriety of the unlawful assaulting or killing of any officer or officers, either of specific individuals or of officers generally, of the Government of the United States or of any other organized government, because of his or their official character, shall be permitted to enter the United States or any Territory or place subject to the jurisdiction thereof. This section shall be enforced by the Secretary of the Treasury under such rules and regulations as he shall prescribe: Provided, That no such person shall be allowed to enter as an immigrant.

That any person who knowingly aids or assists any such person to enter the United States or any Territory or place subject to the jurisdiction thereof, or who connives or conspires with any person or persons to allow, procure, or permit any such person to enter therein, except pursuant to such rules and regulations made by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall be fined not less than five hundred nor more than five thousand dollars, or imprisoned for not less than one nor more than five years, or both.

Mr. SHATTUC. I move to amend the section just read by striking out, in lines 7 and 8, the words "provided that no such person shall be allowed to enter as an immigrant." I am a little afraid that the distinguished gentleman, chairman of the Judiciary Committee, does not know what an "immigrant" is.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHATTUC]. It is to strike out, in lines 7 and 8, the words "provided that no such person shall be allowed to enter as an immigrant."

Mr. SHATTUC. I should like the privilege of asking a few questions of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee before I offer the remainder of my amendment. I wish to ask him whether he knows what an "immigrant" is? [Laughter.]

Mr. RAY of New York. Well, I have met a great many people and seen a great many coming in, whom I supposed to be immigrants.

Mr. SHATTUC. Give us the legal or judicial definition of the word.

Mr. RAY of New York. I am not going to stand here and allow the gentleman from Ohio to run a school, he acting as teacher and asking me questions, and I as pupil answering them. There is nothing so likely to lead a man into difficulty as an ordeal of that kind.

Mr. SHATTUC. And there is nothing in this world that would do you so much good and make you appear to such advantage as putting yourself under my charge for a while.

Mr. RAY of New York. I concede that.

Mr. SHATTUC. I have the floor.

Mr. RAY of New York. No, you called me up.

Mr. SHATTUC. But I have the floor now, and decline to yield further. [Laughter.] I say there is nothing that would become the gentleman so much and make him appear to such advantage as for him to look into the dictionary and see what the definition of the word "immigrant" is. Therefore I have offered in good faith this motion to strike out the proviso of this section.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Will not the gentleman from Ohio tell us what his definition is?

Mr. SHATTUC. With great pleasure. An immigrant is one who comes to this country with a view of making a permanent residence here. Now, persons who do not come here with the view of making their permanent residence here would not come under the provisions of this bill. I want to help you great constitutional lawyers out. [Laughter.]

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. The gentleman is very accommodating.

Mr. SHATTUC. Sure.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the proviso which the gentleman from Ohio proposes to substitute for that embraced in the section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That no such person shall be allowed to enter if he intends to become a permanent resident or citizen of this country.

Mr. SHATTUC. That is what the language of the bill ought to be if you want to shut out immigrants. But I will withdraw my proposition, if there is no objection, and will permit the chairman of the Judiciary Committee to run this business to suit himself. [Laughter.] I simply wanted to "teach school" to this distinguished man, because when I was managing a bill a few days since on this floor as chairman of the Immigration Committee he thought for just one moment he would show me how to write an immigration bill, and I want to reciprocate by showing him how to write an anarchy bill.

Mr. RAY of New York. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. SHATTUC. Very well; then I have not another word to say. [Laughter.]

Mr. GILBERT. I have an amendment which I desire to offer to section 11.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 11 by striking out in lines 13 and 14 the words "except pursuant to such rules and regulations made by the Secretary of the Treasury."

Mr. GILBERT. Mr. Chairman, the Secretary of the Treasury ought not to be permitted to nullify this statute by any rules or regulations which he may issue. That officer has elsewhere been authorized to enforce this statute by proper rules and regulations. This language here seems to confer upon him authority to annul the section and, by rules and regulations, enlarge the limitations so as to allow anybody that he may choose to enter this country. Those words ought to be stricken out.

Mr. RAY of New York. I desire to say only a word on this subject. The Secretary of the Treasury, if he enforces this bill as he ought, will have to make rules and regulations and live up to them. But there will occasionally be a time when some person desires to come in, not as an immigrant but as a visitor, as did Prince Henry of the German Empire not long since. Now, to enforce ordinary rules against such a person as that would be rather an insult, not only to the individual but to the nation.

Mr. GILBERT. But you have not prohibited——

Mr. RAY of New York. And if we did not make some such exception the Secretary of the Treasury would have no discretion.

Mr. GILBERT. But you have not elsewhere prohibited such person as Prince Henry from coming, or any other unobjectionable character.

Mr. RAY of New York. That is true, not absolutely; but we have provided for rules and regulations which would have to be enforced, and which, if so drawn as to make this law efficient, would have to be enforced against all persons coming; and all persons would have to be examined as to their beliefs, and as to their residence, and as to many things—their age and parentage, etc. Now, we put that proviso in there so as to give the Secretary of the Treasury a discretion in enforcing those rules. It can not do any harm, and it better be there.

Mr. GILBERT. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, and Mr. Chairman of the committee, that every applicant at our ports for permission to enter our territory either comes within the prohibited rules or he does not. If he does come within the prohibited rules, the Secretary of the Treasury ought not to be allowed to establish any rules or regulations to annul that decision. If he does not come within the prohibitions, then there is no necessity for the proviso.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 13. That in all prosecutions under the provisions of the first seven sections of this act it shall be presumed, until the contrary is proved, that the President of the United States, or Vice-President of the United States, or other officer of the United States entitled by law to succeed to the Presidency, as the case may be, was, at the time of the commission of the alleged offense, engaged in the performance of his official duties. Nothing in this act contained shall be construed as an admission or declaration that there is a time when either of such officers, during the tenure of his office, is not engaged in the performance of his official duties.

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For section 13 substitute the following:

"That in all prosecutions under the provisions of the first seven sections of this act every material allegation contained in the indictment shall be proven beyond every reasonable doubt."

The CHAIRMAN. I would suggest to the gentleman from Mississippi that this is a substitute for section 13, is it not?

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. If this were acted upon at this time, it would preclude any amendment to section 13, and the Chair does not know whether there are amendments to be offered or not.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I have a committee amendment. It is simply verbal, for the purpose of perfecting the section. I move to amend by inserting, after the word "who," on page 9, in line 5, the word "knowingly," so that it will read, "or who knowingly makes an affidavit," etc.

The CHAIRMAN. I will state to the gentleman from Maine that he can make that motion only by unanimous consent.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that section has been passed and completed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine can not make that motion except by unanimous consent.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. We have passed that section, I understand.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Very well.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 9, line 11, add the word "conclusively" after the word "be;" and in line 12 strike out the words "until the contrary is proved."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendments proposed by the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Chairman, no one knows what it is.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk has just read it. He will again report it for the benefit of the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK. I would like him to read the section as it would read if amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

That in all prosecutions under the provisions of the first seven sections of this act it shall be conclusively presumed that the President of the United States, etc.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I hope that this amendment will be adopted. It will simplify the bill and make it absolutely and clearly constitutional. It will make it very clear that the President of the United States, that great and only great executive officer, is always charged and always clothed with authority of power, and the presumption will always be conclusive.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I oppose the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey, as I likewise oppose this section. To adopt the amendment would simply conclude the defendant when arraigned from making any plea at all except that of guilty, and would make the case complete when the indictment was read. It would be, in fact, nothing but a judicial lynching at once. Now, Mr. Chairman, we have been here for several days discussing this matter, and most of us agree with the Committee on the Judiciary, that in order to give the United States court jurisdiction at all of the offenses set out in this bill, it must be because of the official character of the persons against whom the assaults are made, or against whom the offense is attempted, or because of the official discharge of their duties, or the omission to discharge some official duty. The very heart, the very essence, of this bill is the fact that the assault is made upon some person while he is in the discharge of his duty as an officer of the United States Government.

This amendment proposes to go further than the section of the bill as reported by the committee, and not only to make the presumption prima facie, but to make it conclusive, so that it can not be rebutted. Even the section of the bill as reported by the committee overturns every rule and principle of the criminal law that ever existed from time immemorial. We have embedded in our system of criminal procedure, and handed down to us from the Roman law, handed down to us from the early English law, a principle which has been repeated again and again in the decisions of the various State courts, and affirmed and reaffirmed by the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, that no presumption of guilt, or of any material fact in the case, is raised against the defendant in any criminal trial.

But here we have an amendment which proposes to make the presumption conclusive. Here we have a bill which proposes to overturn the ancient, venerated, and long-established law that the defendant is presumed to be innocent, and it is presumed that he has committed no offense, and that this presumption requires not simply that it be rebutted, but that it be overturned by proof beyond a reasonable doubt.

I wish I had the time to read the decision which I have here by the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Coffin v. The United States, in 156 United States Supreme Court Reports, page 445.

The learned Justice White, who delivered the opinion, lays it down as an axiomatic proposition that, in every criminal trial held according to law, humanity, Christianity, and civilization demand that the presumption shall be that the defendant is innocent of every substantive fact, of every necessary ingredient to make out the crime.

But here is a proposition by the committee—and the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. STEWART] goes further than the proposition of the committee. We are to presume that the defendant is guilty of that fact which gives to the courts jurisdiction of the offense and makes the defendant guilty. You might as well provide by this section that he shall not be heard at all. You might as well provide that wherever a grand jury shall indict the defendant, he shall be sentenced by the court, without plea and without trial. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, I move that debate on section 13 and all amendments thereto now pending close in five minutes.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. I object to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York moves that debate on the pending section and all pending amendments shall close in five minutes.

The question being taken, the Chairman announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee demanded a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 75, nays 35.

Accordingly the motion was agreed to.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. PAYNE. There is an amendment pending.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment pending. Does the gentleman desire to speak to that amendment?

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. I do, Mr. Chairman; yes. I want to say that I think those of us who disagree with the majority on this thirteenth section ought to have been given more time for its discussion. It is one of the most important features of this whole bill.

Mr. RAY of New York. I know, but you have had three days to discuss it.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. We have not had any such thing, begging your pardon. According to your motion here, which has been carried, we have but five minutes to discuss this section of the bill.

Mr. RAY of New York. What I mean to say is that we have had this bill under discussion now in general debate for two full days, and that included section 13.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. I understand that. Now, I want to say that I believe the distinguished gentlemen who compose the majority of the Judiciary Committee have woven a net of legal incongruity and absurdity which is extreme. In this country you can not convict a defendant except by proof beyond a reasonable doubt, and no matter what the charge is, the defendant is presumed to be innocent until the contrary is proven. Yet it is proposed to go ahead here and make a legislative declaration that there is no time when any of these officers, during their tenure of office, are not engaged in the performance of their official duties.

I say that you are legislating against anarchy, and I am as much in favor of doing that as any gentleman on this floor can possibly be. Let us legislate by fair, equal, just, and equitable laws, and let us eliminate this kind of legal incongruity and not enact it into law. It seems to me that all after the word "duties," in line 17, ought to be stricken out, and that the question whether or not an officer is engaged in an official act ought to be one of fact, just like all other facts are submitted to the jury, under proper instructions from the court. Now, the Federal court, if this bill goes into law, has jurisdiction of these cases; and this question ought to be a question of fact, to be determined by the jury from all the facts and circumstances.

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word of the pending motion, and incidentally I would like to congratulate the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary for the magnificent front that they have presented here in the arrangement of this case. They have treated those who were in favor of the bill and those who were opposed to the bill with equal consideration. The front that they have presented reminds me of a court sitting in banc; a great big wall, a wall of Troy you almost might say, absolutely impregnable. I congratulate myself, Mr. Chairman, on the fact that I am a member of the bar, a member of the judiciary, not of this great House of Representatives, but of the great State of Pennsylvania. [Applause]. Therefore, gentlemen, I would again express my congratulations.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. What office did the gentlemen hold as a member of the judiciary?

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. I offer an amendment.

Mr. THOMAS of Iowa. I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Iowa, a member of the committee.

Mr. THOMAS of Iowa. I desire to submit the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 13 by inserting immediately after the word "duties," in line 17, of page 9, the following words: "and that the alleged offense was committed because of his official character and because of his official acts and omissions."

Mr. THOMAS of Iowa. I rise, Mr. Chairman, to make an inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. THOMAS of Iowa. The motion of the gentleman from New York, as I understood it, was that all debate on the pending amendment be closed in five minutes, and that being so, it still leaves the section open to amendment and debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The section is open to amendment, but not to debate.

Mr. THOMAS of Iowa. I will ask unanimous consent that the motion of the gentleman from New York be read for the information of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will have it read without unanimous consent.

Mr. RAY of New York. My request was very clear.

The CHAIRMAN. It was that all debate upon the section and all amendments thereto be closed. The Chair put that in as loud a voice as it was possible for him to use.

Mr. THOMAS of Iowa. The Chair put the motion to limit to the House on the pending amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. All that the Chair can say is that he overrules the point of order made by the gentleman from Iowa. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I would like to have the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa read again.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again read.

The amendment was again reported.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Now, Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out section 13.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. I have offered an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman offer the amendment to the section?

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. I offer it now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 17, after the word "duties," strike out the remainder of the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. I offered a substitute at the beginning.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi offers an amendment in the nature of a substitute, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

That in all prosecutions under the provisions of the first seven sections of this act every material allegation contained in the indictment shall be proven beyond every reasonable doubt.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. There is no debate.

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. I ask unanimous consent that I may be allowed to address the House for a few minutes on my amendment.

Mr. RAY of New York. I must object, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I hope the gentleman will not object to my colleague being heard.

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. I will withdraw the substitute and ask that it be offered as section 14 to the bill, at the proper time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment which he proposed to section 13. Is there objection?

Mr. RAY of New York. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is then on the motion of the gentleman to amend by way of a substitute.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 44, noes 79.

So the substitute was rejected.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I move to strike out section 13 of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion has been put and negatived.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I think the Chairman must certainly be mistaken about that.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion was put in the form of striking out and insert.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. This now is a plain proposition to strike it out.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is right. The question is on the motion to strike out section 13.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided, and there were—ayes 59, noes 67.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. SMITH, and the gentleman from New York, Mr. RAY, will please act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 60, noes 68.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment as an additional section.

The CHAIRMAN. If there are no further amendments to section 13, the gentleman from Mississippi offers the following amendment as an additional section.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 14. On the trial of all cases under the first seven sections of this act, the defendant shall be presumed to be innocent until the contrary is proven to the exclusion of all reasonable doubt.

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. Now, Mr. Chairman, in support of that section——

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a point of order. As I understood it, this proposition is the same provision that was voted on as one of the amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi offered the proposition to the thirteenth section of the bill as an amendment in the shape of a substitute. Thereupon he proposed to withdraw it and objection was made and the vote was taken and the committee voted against permitting that matter to become an amendment to section 13. But the Chair is of opinion that the gentleman has now a right to offer it as an additional section to the bill, and that the former vote did not bar his right. The House might desire to have it in this form and not in the other.

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that for quite a number of years prior to coming to Congress I was actively engaged in interpreting the criminal law as district attorney and judge of one of the circuit courts in Mississippi, I feel that I am warranted in making a suggestion as to the constitutionality, legality, or necessity of section 13 of this bill, which section reads as follows:

SEC. 13. That in all prosecutions under the provisions of the first seven sections of this act it shall be presumed, until the contrary is proved, that the President of the United States, or Vice-President of the United States, or other officer of the United States entitled by law to succeed to the Presidency, as the case may be, was, at the time of the commission of the alleged offense, engaged in the performance of his official duties. Nothing in this act contained shall be construed as an admission or declaration that there is a time when either of such officers, during the tenure of his office, is not engaged in the performance of his official duties.

In discussing this measure, and particularly the above section, I am glad to know that it can be discussed from an unbiased standpoint, free from the charges of partisanship or politics. I take it that there is not a member on either side of this House who does not sincerely desire that some measure be adopted to protect the President of the United States as far as it is possible legally or, I might say, within legal bounds so to do.

In other words, we are, I think, all opposed to anarchy, whether it be of the kind that would dissolve society and law in blood and inaugurate a system of no government or by mutual agreement rescind or break up a system now existing and every man announce for himself and assume the rôle of needing no laws, no government. But is this measure not a cloak to give greater concessions to a chosen few rather than an honest effort to suppress anarchy in this country? The States which go to make up this the grandest country of organized government are jointly jealous of the contract entered into and the Constitution which binds us, and are, therefore, unwilling that any disbelievers in our faith should come between us and our love of country, State, and laws, and the people would resist such an attempt with the iron hand of the law and, if necessary, enact something more stringent.

Therefore, when we are confronted with a condition such as is exampled by the depraved, distempered, and weakened mind of a Czolgosz, we are with one accord anxious to make laws satisfactory to ourselves and suitable for emergencies as they present themselves. But, while we are here to legislate, are we not to do so, ever with the knowledge of our power, and with a feeling that our duty will not be done should we do other than that which is permitted us to do under our Constitution and the laws which govern us in all matters? In other words, Mr. Chairman, I for one am unwilling to have a fit of hysterics, lose my balance, and fall into what might seem popular clamor, and thereby ignore long-known doctrines or laws which by use and service have become so honored that no one can question their effectiveness, justness, and righteousness.

Therefore in offering the section, which shall be known as 14, I do so with no intention of trying to prevent the passage of this bill, because it is a foregone conclusion it will pass as reported by the committee. But I offer the following as a new section in order to, in a measure, bring the proof of the case within the well-founded law governing such cases, and submit it in this form:

SEC. 14. On the trial of all cases under the first seven sections of this act the defendant shall be presumed to be innocent until the contrary is proven to the exclusion of all reasonable doubt.

Now, I ask in all sincerity and earnestness: Can there be objection to that section? If there is, pray tell me why.

I know there are many good lawyers in this House, and all the legal lore is not to be found on either side, and it does seem to me that in trying to perfect a bill which has, to my mind, many uncalled for sections and unnecessary ones, we should at least be willing and glad to perfect it as far as is practical and possible.

Under section 13 of this act there is a "presumption" contained—one would ordinarily consider that word very innocent. To quote the language of that section:

That in all prosecutions under the provisions of the first seven sections of this act it shall be presumed, until the contrary is proved, that the President of the United States or Vice-President of the United States, or other officer, etc., was at the time of the commission of the offense in the discharge of his duty, until the contrary be shown.

In view of the fact that the United States courts can only obtain jurisdiction of a case when an officer of the Government is in the discharge of his duty as such, it makes the thing presumed by this act one of materiality and one without which no prosecution could possibly be had in the Federal courts; that fact, then, being material to the prosecution, without which none could be had in the Federal court, should, I declare, not be presumed, but should be proven as any other material allegation in the indictment.

The nearest analogy that I can point is that where in murder the use of a deadly weapon, the malice requisite to murder is presumed, but in that the use of a deadly weapon is a fact which must be proven by the Government or State before there is any presumption. So, that he was President in the discharge of his duty is a fact, just as the use of a deadly weapon, which is susceptible of proof and should be proven like any other material allegation in the case. I think it is hardly necessary for me to cite authorities to sustain this contention of mine, but I submit the following as being some of the fundamental principles of the law generally accepted as such, the contrary opinion as expressed by different gentlemen notwithstanding.

When one is accused of murder the law presumes him to be innocent until the contrary is made to appear, and that beyond all reasonable doubt; but if it be shown that he killed the deceased with a deadly weapon, the general presumption of innocence (in so far as malice is concerned) yields to the specific proof, and the law infers that the killing, if unexplained, was malicious, and therefore murder.

Thus you will note that the only presumption of a necessary fact to secure a conviction is upon proof being made of a fact, to wit: "The use of a deadly weapon." Whereupon, when that proof is made, the malice requisite may be presumed. This is such a plain proposition of the settled doctrine of the law in my State, Mississippi, and all other States which I have investigated, that to give the decisions covering that point would require much more space than a denial among sensible men would demand, but here are a few from Mississippi and a good one from the United States Supreme Court: McDaniel v. State, 8 S. and M., p. 400; Green v. State, 28 Miss., p. 687; Mask v. State, 36 Miss., p. 77; Hawthorn v. State, 58 Miss., p. 778; Bishop v. State, 62 Miss., p. 289; Lamar v. State, 63 Miss., p. 265; James v. State, 45 Miss., p. 572; Goodwin v. State, 73 Miss., p. 873. And this one from the very court which will determine the constitutionality and legality of the law you are now trying to enact. I refer to Coffin v. United States (156 U. S. Rep., 432), and will quote from the opinion by Mr. Justice White a few lines:

The forty-fourth charge asked and refused is as follows:

The law presumes that persons charged with crime are innocent until proven by competent evidence to be guilty. To the benefit of this presumption the defendant is entitled, and this presumption stands as his sufficient protection unless it has been moved by evidence proving his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt.

That was an instruction asked for by the defendant and by the court refused. Now, let us see what the great court of last resort in this country says about it after having reviewed a number of other charges, as they are called, which we will call instructions. Justice White says:

The fact, then, is that while the court refused to instruct as to the presumption of innocence it instructed fully on the subject of reasonable doubt.

And the court further says:

The principle that there is a presumption of innocence in favor of the accused is the undoubted law, axiomatic and elementary, and its enforcement lies at the foundation of the administration of our criminal law.

Case reversed.

I am opposed to this act from another standpoint. I am inclined to believe that the first seven sections are unnecessary, ill advised, and dangerous in the extreme.

The laws of the States are amply sufficient to care for the citizen or the stranger within their gates, and I might suggest that they are jealous of their right to see that justice is done in the ferreting out of crime and seeing the law properly enforced.

The Constitution of the United States gives to the United States rights to protect its officers while in the discharge of their duties, and Congress has made suitable provisions for their care, but the States have reserved to themselves rights which they have long been exercising and against which little complaint can be urged in so far as the law itself is concerned. In other words, there is and can be no possible question that the State laws taken with the Federal statutes are adequate. If they were not in so far as the President and even the Vice-President are concerned, I would not hesitate to vote for some measure constitutionally and legally prepared which would give those two officials proper and secure protection.

The doctrine of States' rights is very dear to me, and every step or act upon the part of Congress to digress from the beaten track so long acceptably and successfully followed should be scrutinized and questioned so long as there is one semblance of doubt as to the result of the enactment of any law.

The love of our State, the affection we have for the laws that govern the people of our States, our friends, our neighbors, our kinsmen, all go to make more dear not only the traditions of our rights, but our legal rights as recognized by the courts of this country and the Constitution of the United States.

Is this not a step in the direction of taking from us our State's rights? Whether it is so intended by this bill or not, it has a tendency in that direction.

There was a bill introduced at this very session for the trial of one accused of train wrecking, if the train carried United States mail, in the Federal court. Why such measures, unless it be that step by step we are to by degrees give up that for which our forefathers stood and that which they maintained?

In our State courts our judges are equally as learned in the law as the Federal, our district attorneys as efficient as those for the Government, our clerks competent, while our sheriffs, being more in touch with the people, are far more capable of executing the court's warrants.

To exemplify this fact, if any be required after the conviction and punishment of the moral pervert Czolgosz in a State court, I need only refer to an instance which, I am sorry to say, took place in my own State—Mississippi. Two United States marshals went in search of some illicit rum makers, and after having secured them—two in number, I believe—they, the marshals, concluded to rest the balance of the night at a house belonging to some one kin to the prisoners—a rather reckless thing to do, perhaps—but at any rate they so decided and went to bed and to sleep, and during the night were foully murdered while they slept. The whole country was aroused, the murderers caught, a special term of the State court convened, and the accused convicted and sentenced to be hung in less than three weeks. Can you gentlemen wish for more speedy or condign punishment and a more perfect execution of the law? Can the same promptness be claimed in the vindication of the law in the trial of Guiteau when tried for the murder of President Garfield? Ah, no! You all recall that trial, which was had in a Federal court.

I quote the language of my friend from Georgia, Mr. BARTLETT, in his discussion of this measure in order to impress the committee with the earnestness of my position and the soundness of my contention. Many other cases could be cited, but these I think, are sufficient.

Mr. BARTLETT said:

I am in favor of protecting the President of the United States from assassination by the anarchists or from any illegal or wanton assault that may be made against him as the head of the Government, because of the fact that he is the President and in discharge of his duty.

I am glad the chairman of this committee and the members who followed him rose to the great height of declaring that a law of the country should be enacted in conformity with the Constitution.

The decision I have in my hand, United States v. Patrick (54 Fed. Rep., 339), refers to the case of the United States against Cruikshank (93 U. S. Reports, p. 553), and Judge Jackson, in discussing this very question, says:

It was of these fundamental rights of life and liberty that the courts said (in United States v. Cruikshank, 92 U. S., 553-554), "Sovereignty for this purpose rests alone with the States."

It is no more the duty or within the power of the United States to punish a conspiracy to falsely imprison or murder within a State than it would be to punish for false imprisonment or murder itself. And that doctrine has been upheld in the case of Logan v. The United States (144 U. S.).

Class legislation, as a rule, is rarely, if ever, acceptable. The same punishment should be meted out to each, and the same cloak and protecting arm of the Government should be ever ready to surround you or me.

I question the right of a Secretary of State or Treasury, or what not, to be allowed something else under the law greater and better than that which has been given the humble citizen. Upon what meat hath been their wont to feed that they should be thus so tenderly nurtured and cared for? And ambassadors of state, with their gilded finery, dazzling the eyes of us plain people, with their elegance. What say you? Can we not speak of them? Can we not look at them? Are we to have another alien and sedition law—a law which has failed to withstand time? Are we as a nation, unequaled in our prowess at arms, our generosity of the wealth that comes to our coffers, exultant in our protestation of upholding the weak against the strong, to admit in one small moment the necessity of making laws which are for the high and mighty and not for the poor and lowly?

Thomas Jefferson declared for "equal rights to all; special privileges to none." By his words I stand. Do you say it is anarchy to so side with the plain people in thus upholding the declarations of Jefferson? As another illustrious man once said, "If this be treason, make the most of it." So say I, If this be anarchy, make the most of it. [Prolonged applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Mississippi.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HENRY of Mississippi) there were 46 ayes and 67 noes.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, I now move that the substitute as amended be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the substitute proposed by the committee as amended.

The question was taken, and the substitute as amended was agreed to.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill as amended to the House with the recommendation that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GROSVENOR, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (S. 3653) for the protection of the President of the United States, and for other purposes, and had instructed him to report the bill back with an amendment with the recommendation that as amended the bill do pass.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I now demand the previous question on the bill and amendment to its final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. That is not quite in order yet.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the passage.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. With or without instructions?

Mr. DE ARMOND. With instructions.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the pending bill be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary with instructions to report the same back amended by striking out sections 3 and 13 thereof.

The SPEAKER (having put the question on agreeing to the motion). The noes appear to have it.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 60, nays 90, answering "present" 17, not voting 184; as follows:

By Mr. STEPHENS of Texas: Petition of citizens of Indian Territory, relating to the education of white children, to accompany House resolution 292—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Also, papers to accompany House bill 14133, to correct the military record of Henry T. Lloyd—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, papers in support of House bill 9951, granting a pension to Martha Helm—to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, paper to accompany House bill 1755, granting a pension to Susan S. Rayner—to the Committee on Pensions.

SENATE.

MONDAY, June 9, 1902.

Prayer by Rev. F. J. PRETTYMAN, of the city of Washington.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last, when, on request of Mr. GALLINGER, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Journal will stand approved, if there be no objection. It is approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the reports of the committees of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the following bills:

A bill (S. 1037) granting an increase of pension to Helen A. B. Du Barry; and

A bill (S. 2975) granting an increase of pension to Levi Hatchett.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. 4071) granting an increase of pension to George C. Tillman;

A bill (S. 4927) granting an increase of pension to Hattie M. Whitney;

A bill (H. R. 949) for the relief of Charles H. Robinson;

A bill (H. R. 1992) granting the right of way to the Alafia, Manatee and Gulf Coast Railway Company through the United States light-house and military reservations on Gasparilla Island, in the State of Florida;

A bill (H. R. 7034) for the relief of Navajo County, Ariz.;

A bill (H. R. 7687) granting an increase of pension to Charles C. Washburn;

A bill (H. R. 8736) ratifying the act of the Territorial legislature of Arizona, approved March 2, 1901, providing a fund for the erection of additional buildings for the University of Arizona;

A bill (H. R. 9592) granting a pension to Emily Briggs;

A bill (H. R. 12085) providing for the completion of a light and fog-signal station in the Patapsco River, Maryland; and

A bill (H. R. 12798) providing for free homesteads in the Ute Indian Reservation, in Colorado.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. FOSTER of Washington presented a petition of the Central Labor Council of Whatcom, Wash., praying for the enactment of legislation increasing the compensation of letter carriers; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. CLARK of Montana presented a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Handy, Mont., praying for the enactment of legislation providing an educational test for immigrants to this country, and also to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors in the Capitol; which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented a petition of the Captain Charles French Chapter, No. 164, Spanish-American War Veterans, of Great Falls, Mont., praying for the enactment of legislation to prevent the desecration of the American flag, etc.; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MALLORY presented a petition of sundry citizens of Florida, praying for the adoption of certain amendments to the internal-revenue law relative to the tax on distilled spirits; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. FRYE presented resolutions adopted by Lafayette Post, No. 140, Department of New York, Grand Army of the Republic, commending the conduct of the Army of the United States in the Philippine Islands; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of the board of alderman and the common council of Lowell, Mass., praying for the enactment of legislation to increase the compensation of letter carriers; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally each with an amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 6015) granting an increase of pension to Clara M. Gihon;

A bill (S. 5882) granting an increase of pension to Merzellah Merrill;

A bill (H. R. 12284) granting an increase of pension to George W. Shaw; and

A bill (H. R. 3500) granting an increase of pension to Kate O. Phillips.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3677) granting an increase of pension to James F. Gray, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am directed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 12995) granting a pension to John Lilley, to report it adversely. I move that the bill be postponed indefinitely, the soldier having died since the bill was introduced.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3641) for the allowance of certain claims for property taken for military purposes within the United States during the war with Spain, reported by the Secretary of War in accordance with the requirements of an item contained in the sundry civil appropriation act, approved June 6, 1900, authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to investigate just claims against the United States for private property taken and used in the military service within the limits of the United States, etc., reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

ESTHER D. HASLAM.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am directed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 6021) granting an increase of pension to Esther D. Haslam, to report it favorably without amendment. As this is a very urgent case, I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Esther D. Haslam, widow of Thomas Haslam, late second lieutenant Company K, Twenty-sixth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, and to pay her a pension of $20 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INVESTIGATION BY COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Some days since the Senate adopted a resolution directing the Committee on Indian Affairs to investigate certain charges made against Hon. William A. Jones, Commissioner of Indian Affairs. I submit a report on the resolution, which I ask to have read.

Mr. HALE. Will it answer——

Mr. STEWART. It ought to be read. It is very short.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. There were certain charges made against the Commissioner of Indian Affairs for some alleged bad conduct in connection with the sale of certain Indian lands. The Committee on Indian Affairs was directed to inquire into the truth of those charges. This is a report of twenty lines exonerating the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and I think it ought to be acted on by the Senate as soon as possible.

Mr. HALE. I have no objection.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I suppose it will not take three minutes.

Mr. HALE. I did not know the Senator proposed action, and it is a short report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The report was read and agreed to, as follows:

The Committee on Indian Affairs, in obedience to the following resolution—

"Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be, and it is hereby, authorized and directed to investigate certain alleged charges in connection with the leasing of the Indian lands on Standing Rock Reservation, contained in a letter of W. V. Wade in Senate Document No. 212, first session Fifty-seventh Congress; and for that purpose to send for persons and papers, take testimony, and have leave to sit during the sessions of Congress; and that the necessary expenses be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate on vouchers to be approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate"— have thoroughly investigated the alleged charges in connection with the leasing of the lands on Standing Rock Reservation.

It summoned W. V. Wade, upon whose letter the charges seem to have been founded, together with all persons of whom it could hear who were supposed to have any knowledge of the facts in the case, and upon a thorough investigation of all parties, the committee are satisfied that there is no foundation whatever for the charges made.

The testimony taken in the case is herewith submitted. It will be seen from this that Mr. Wade admits that the language used by him in the letter referred to was based on rumors and that positive proof was adduced showing that Commissioner Jones had no connection, direct or remote, with the leases in question, and that his conduct in connection with them was entirely unselfish.

The committee are satisfied fully after careful investigation that there is no foundation whatever for the charges made, and they respectfully beg to be discharged from further consideration of the resolution.

MESSAGES AND PAPERS OF THE PRESIDENTS.

Mr. PLATT of New York, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the concurrent resolution submitted by Mr. GALLINGER December 12, 1901, reported it without amendment; and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 9,000 copies of the document known as Messages and Papers of the Presidents, of which 3,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 6,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, the remainder, if any, to be held by the superintendent of documents, subject to the future action of Congress; and an edition of 10,000 copies shall be printed, to be held by the superintendent of documents and by him sold at the actual cost of publication.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. FAIRBANKS introduced a bill (S. 6108) to correct the military record of John M. Benson; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HEITFELD introduced a bill (S. 6109) to renew and extend certain letters patent; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. GALLINGER introduced a bill (S. 6110) granting an increase of pension to Charles A. Cooke; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PERKINS introduced a bill (S. 6111) to authorize the Secretary of War, in his discretion, to favor American-built ships in the transportation of Government supplies to the Philippines across the Pacific Ocean; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FRYE introduced a bill (S. 6112) granting an increase of pension to Daniel J. Hogan; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MITCHELL introduced a bill (S. 6113) granting an increase of pension to James H. Preston; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CARMACK introduced a bill (S. 6114) for the relief of John V. Wright; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 6115) for the relief of Sue M. Milhous; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BURTON introduced a bill (S. 6116) for the protection of stock raising on public lands; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WARREN introduced a bill (S. 6117) for the relief of George Lea Febiger; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. MITCHELL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 11997) granting to the Hawaii Ditch Company, Limited, the right of way over public lands in the districts of North and South Kohala, in the island of Hawaii, for the purpose of constructing and maintaining ditches or canals and the necessary reservoirs, dams, and the like, for irrigation and domestic purposes in said districts; which was referred to the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HALE (by request) submitted an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. 12865) regulating the use of telephone wires in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BURTON submitted an amendment relative to sergeant-majors and senior quartermaster-sergeants in the Marine Corps, intended to be proposed by him to the naval appropriation bill; which was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to increase the number of pharmacists in the Navy, intended to be proposed by him to the naval appropriation bill; which was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

ELECTION OF SENATORS BY DIRECT VOTE.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask to have printed a list furnished me by my late colleague, Mr. Chandler, being a list of the principal speeches and reports made in Congress in recent years on the election of United States Senators by the people. It is a very brief paper, and I move that it be printed as a document, as it will be very convenient for reference.

The motion was agreed to.

HENRY A. B. DU BARRY.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 1037) granting an increase of pension to Helen A. B. Du Barry having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its amendment.

J. H. GALLINGER,
J. R. BURTON,
T. M. PATTERSON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

C. A. SULLOWAY,
HENRY R. GIBSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

WILLIAM C. HICKOX.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4103) granting a pension to William C. Hickox having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows:

In lieu of the sum proposed by the Senate insert "$16;" and the Senate agree to the same.

J. H. GALLINGER,
J. C. PRITCHARD,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

C. A. SULLOWAY,
S. W. SMITH,
J. A. NORTON,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

SOLOMON P. BROCKWAY.

Mr. McCUMBER submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10545) granting an increase of pension to Solomon P. Brockway, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed by the Senate insert "$24;" and the Senate agree to the same.

P. J. McCUMBER,
JOSEPH SIMON,
JAMES P. TALIAFERRO,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

HENRY R. GIBSON,
H. B. DARRAGH,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

CRIMINAL, PAUPER, AND DEFECTIVE CLASSES.

Mr. NELSON. I have a short article by Arthur MacDonald, of Washington, D. C., relating to the criminal, pauper, and defective classes. There is a bill relating to this matter pending before the Committee on the Judiciary, and I move that the paper be printed as a document and referred to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

CONSULAR REPORTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Printing:

To the Senate:

In response to the resolution of the Senate of March 2, 1901, directed to the Secretary of State, I transmit a communication from that officer submitting reports from consular officers of the United States giving an account of each consulate and consular agency, showing its principal industries and exports, the surrounding climatic conditions, the general cost of living, and similar information.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, June 9, 1902.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there further morning business?

Mr. HALE. I move that the naval appropriation bill be taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from Maine to the fact that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] gave notice that immediately after the routine morning business to-day he would address the Senate.

Mr. HALE. I think the Senator from North Carolina will not object to going on with the appropriation bill. I should like to take it up anyhow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, has the morning business been concluded?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business is closed, and the Senator from Maine moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should like to state to the Senator from Maine that I gave notice last Friday I would submit some remarks to the Senate this morning at the close of the routine morning business on the bill for the establishment of a park in the Southern Appalachian Mountains, and I should like to proceed now, according to the notice I gave.

Mr. HALE. I shall make my course in the matter subject to the convenience of the Senator from North Carolina. I should like very much to have the naval appropriation bill taken up. It has no controversies in it and will not take a long time, and everybody is desirous that we shall get the appropriation bills out of the way. I have no doubt the Senator so feels. If he had as lief wait until after the appropriation bill is finished, I would prefer to go on, but still in this matter, as I said, I yield to his convenience about it.

Mr. SIMMONS. I would very much prefer, if it meets with the Senator's approval, to go on now. I shall get through in time for him to have the bill taken up.

Mr. HALE. Very well. Then let me get the bill up and then I will yield to the Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 14046) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs with amendments.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that the amendments be considered in their order. When this is agreed upon I will yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that it be read for amendment, and that the committee amendments shall first receive consideration. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

"FIVE YEARS IN PANAMA," BY DR. NELSON.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from North Carolina kindly yields to me for a moment.

Mr. SIMMONS. It will take only a short time?

Mr. MORGAN. Oh, yes; only a short time.

Yesterday I obtained a work from the Public Library that I did not know of before, entitled Five Years in Panama, written by Dr. Wilford Nelson, who resided there as a practicing physician for five years—from 1881 to 1886. I am having copied a number of extracts from that book. I ask leave to have them printed as a document for the information of the Senate. Of course the book will find its way into the RECORD in the debate, and the cheapest and easiest way to get it before the Senate is to print as a document the extracts from it that I desire to have printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator inform the Senate to what extent he desires to print extracts from the book?

Mr. MORGAN. I can not state by the pages of the book, but it will make about 15 or 20 pages of octavo matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. HALE. What is the request?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama asks that there may be printed certain extracts from a book relating to Panama.

Mr. MORGAN. The gentleman who called it to my attention——

Mr. HALE. I do not ask the Senator to explain it. I only want to say that I suppose as we have begun printing all kinds of papers in reference to this subject it would not be fitting to interpose an objection, and I do not. If we ever get out of this course at some time, however, I shall object to essays and private matters being submitted and printed as public documents. As I have said, this has started and pretty much everything has gone in, and I will not object to the Senator's request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request for printing the matter referred to as a document? The Chair hears none, and the order is made.

SOUTHERN APPALACHIAN FOREST RESERVE.

Mr. BURTON. With the permission of the Senator from North Carolina, I desire to call attention to Senate bill No. 5228, upon the same subject the Senator is going to talk about. At the proper time when Senate bill 492, for the purchase of lands in the Appalachian range, shall be brought up, I desire to substitute Senate bill 5228 for Senate bill 492, reported by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. PRITCHARD]. The bill that I refer to and to which I want to call the attention of Senators is the committee bill. It has been carefully protected and safeguarded and meets with the approbation, as I understand it, of both Senators from North Carolina, as well as of the entire committee. I give notice that I shall call the bill up some time during the week when its consideration will not interfere with other business.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I had intended to refer to the confusion which has arisen in reference to the bill to which the Senator from Kansas alludes, and upon which he will ask a vote. It has arisen by reason of the fact that the Committee on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game has favorably reported during the present session two bills, both providing for the establishment of a national reserve in the Southern Appalachian Mountains.

The first bill is No. 492, which was introduced by my colleague [Mr. PRITCHARD], and which provides for the purchase by the Government of 2,000,000 acres of land at a limit of cost of $5,000,000. The second bill, No. 5228, which has been reported by the committee as a substitute for the first, is a bill originally introduced in the House by Hon. JAMES M. MOODY of North Carolina, and it provides for the purchase of 4,000,000 acres of land and fixes the limit of cost at $10.000,000. That is the bill which is before the Senate and upon which I desire to speak.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I presume that during the course of his speech he will explain it, but I have been so busy with other matters that I have not had time to examine the bill. In what States is this land situated? Is it situated in more than one State, I will ask the Senator?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir. The bill——

Mr. GALLINGER. I presume the Senator will explain that during his speech.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will explain it right now. The exact location of the park is not fixed by the bill, but there is a general provision in the bill that it shall be located in the Southern Appalachian Mountains, in the States of West Virginia, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Alabama, and Georgia. It is expected, however, that the park will be located in the higher ranges of the Great Smoky Mountains, the Unake Mountains, and the Black Mountains in the Blue Ridge, because of the superior altitude and scenery and because of the unrivaled hardwood and long-leaf forests in those regions; but the exact location of the park within the limits of these States is wisely, I think, left within the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture.

Four million acres, it is contemplated, shall be purchased under the direction of the Secretary of Agriculture for this purpose, and the limit of cost is fixed at $10,000,000, because upon thorough investigation the Department reached the conclusion that these lands could be purchased at an average of from two to two dollars and a half an acre. While the limit of cost is fixed at $10,000,000, only $2,000,000 of that sum is made available for the next four years, the idea of the committee being that it would be at least ten years before the whole 4,000,000 acres would be purchased and title secured.

The bill further provides as a safeguard that the Secretary of Agriculture shall make an annual report to Congress during the time he is engaged in making purchases of the land of which the park is to be composed.

Mr. President, I have heard but one I might term substantive ground of objection to this bill, and that is that it commits the Government to a new line of policy which may eventually involve the expenditure of large sums of money. I want for a short time to examine this argument, for it is the basic ground of opposition to the bill.

It is well known that during the last ten years there have been organized and established in the United States 41 national forest reservations. These reservations are located in 13 different States. They comprise a total area of 72,000 square miles, the smallest containing about 18,000 acres, and the largest about four and one-half million acres.

Not a single one of these forest reservations is located east of the Mississippi River. It is true that in the region east of the Mississippi River there are a number of so-called military parks or reservations, all of a limited area and for a specific purpose. There are certain battlefield reservations, such as the Chickamauga battle ground and the Gettysburg battle-ground park, also of limited area and established because of the historic interest attaching to those particular spots. But of course these can not be called forest reservations or parks in such a sense as the Yellowstone is a park or the reservations in the West are national forest reservations.

Now, the establishment by the Government within a decade of these numerous and extensive Western reservations would be, I take it, accepted as a precedent for the legislation proposed in this bill and as a sufficient answer to the suggestion that it will commit the Government to a new policy but for the fact that all of these parks were carved out of the public domain, land which already belonged to the Government, while it is proposed by this bill that the Government shall go into the market and purchase the land out of which the park is to be established.

Mr. President, I concede that there is a distinction between the proposition involved in the establishment of these Western reserves and the proposition of this bill, but I think it is a distinction without a substantive difference, because there can not be any material difference in principle between an appropriation of the property of the people and an appropriation of the money of the people. Whether these Western reserves were originally acquired by purchase, as in the case of the one which is located in what is known as the "Louisiana Purchase," or whether acquired by war, as in the case of those that are located within the territory embraced in the Mexican cession, or acquired by discovery, as in the case of those embraced in the Oregon and Washington territory, in each case the lands were the property of the people and constituted a national asset of considerable value at the time they were organized. Those lands are used for parks, and to-day I am informed (I do not know whether it is correct or not) by a man who I think has knowledge of these matters that the land thus appropriated by the Government if now owned by the Government would be worth at least $100,000,000.

If those lands had not been appropriated by the Government for this specific purpose they would have been subject to sale, and when sold the money would have been covered into the Treasury and become a part of the property of the people.

Mr. President, while the most of these reservations were carved, as I said, out of the national domain, that is not true of all of them. I do not wish to argue, although I think it would be arguable, that the purchase by the Government of lands for the establishment of military and battlefield parks is a precedent for the proposed legislation, because I think that would be a doubtful argument and I do not wish to get upon doubtful ground, but there is one purchase by the Government for the purpose of a park reservation that is not only analogous, but is identical to that proposed here; as lawyers sometimes say, it is on all fours with it, and that is the purchase by the Government in 1896 from the Blackfoot Indians of a large body of land. I do not know how many acres there were, but I presume a great many, because the price paid by the Government was a million and a half dollars, and the subsequent use made of this land so purchased was to enlarge the Flathead Reservation in Montana.

So, Mr. President, I submit that if the purchase by the Government of these large bodies of land in the West for forest reserves is differentiable in letter it is certainly not differentiable in substance and spirit from the proposition in this bill. Hence, Mr. President, the friends of the bill insist that it does not commit the Government to any new line of policy, but that the establishment of parks and forest reservations has become a well-settled policy of the Government. If it is not already the settled policy I think it is a wise policy, and the sooner we enter upon it the better.

There is hardly a European government, Mr. President, which has not realized the importance and necessity of bringing its mountain forests under government control and ownership. In a number of European countries, notably France and Italy, where deforestation has resulted in the destruction of immense tracts of agricultural lands, impoverishing a great number of farmers and peasants, the Government has entered upon the more costly and the more difficult scheme of reforestation.

I shall not discuss that feature of the subject further than to say that in the last thirty years France has spent $40,000,000 in an attempt to restore conditions to where they were before the mountain-side deforestation began, and Italy, comparatively a poor country, has spent at least $12,000,000 in attempting the same thing in order to save the valley lands that are being destroyed by reason of the deforestation of her mountains. Although I had intended to do so, I shall not enter upon that line of discussion, because the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW], who spoke on Saturday with a knowledge gained from actual observation of these matters, covered that branch of the subject very thoroughly and very effectively.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to refer to a suggestion which has been made, though not upon this floor, but on the outside and in private conversation with Senators, that there was some private financial interest behind this bill; that there was possibly some job in it; that somebody wanted to unload upon the Government certain worthless lands.

Mr. President, there is no foundation for this suggestion. First, because there are no large holdings, either private or corporate, within the limits prescribed by the bill. My understanding is that the largest single holding of lands within this area is about 5,000 acres, and as far as I know or as I have ever heard there is nobody urging this legislation who has any financial interest in it.

But, Mr. President, as I said in the outset, the bill very wisely, I think, places the purchase of these lands in the hands of the Secretary of Agriculture and I see no reason why anyone should apprehend that the slightest imposition would be practiced upon the Government when the Secretary of Agriculture, for whom we all have the highest regard, stands between the Government and such a job as that. There is absolutely no foundation, I think, in fact, for the suggestion.

Neither, Mr. President, is there any foundation for the suggestion that this is a local measure—that is, local in the sense that it is intended to benefit especially only three or four or five States. The measure is essentially national in its features. The agitation in favor of this legislation came originally not from the section of country where the park is to be located, but it was a sort of spontaneous movement that seemed suddenly to spring up in all parts of the country.

The first definite and organized movement in favor of it, it is true, was the action of the association known as the National Southern Appalachian Park Association, organized in the city of Asheville, but Asheville, although it is a small place, is one of the most cosmopolitan towns in America, and the membership of this association is not confined to residents of that locality, but it comprises prominent men from every part of the Union. This was the first association that brought this matter to the attention of Congress, and it did it in a memorial of singular force and clearness, setting forth the national features of the bill.

Upon this initiative a similar organization in Boston followed, known, I think, as the Appalachian Mountain Club of Boston, organized away back yonder in 1878, containing about 1,200 members, most of them living in New England, but it has members, I understand, residing in other parts of the country. This organization followed that of North Carolina in a memorial to Congress, and after that there were more than a dozen, I think, of the leading scientific and trade associations of the country which likewise memorialized Congress in favor of this measure. Among these are:

The American Association for the Advancement of Science, the largest and most representative body of scientists on the continent, which met in New York in June, 1900; the American Forestry Association, with a large membership, including the forestry experts from all parts of the country, which met here in Washington December 13, 1900; the National Board of Trade, which met in this city in January, 1901, and various other trade and scientific organizations in different parts of the country.

Mr. President, there is one resolution about this matter recently passed by an association of great importance which I wish to specifically call to the attention of the Senate. It is a resolution adopted by the National Hardwood Lumber Association at St. Louis, May 16 of this year. That association, I am informed, has the largest membership and capital of any similar association in the world. It was organized for the purpose of protecting the interests of the hard-wood manufacturers of the country. I wish to read it. It is very brief:

Whereas the numerous forest reserves established by the National Government are all located in the West and not one of them embraces any portion of the great hard-wood forests of the country:

Resolved, That the National Hardwood Lumber Association respectfully urges upon Congress the importance of establishing the proposed National Forest Reserve in the hard-wood region of the Southern Appalachian Mountains, both as a means of preserving these mountains and preventing disastrous floods, and also as a means of demonstrating to the people of this country what can be done in the way of using hard-wood forests, and at the same time perpetuating them for the benefit of future generations.

The subject, Mr. President, having thus been brought to the attention of the American people by these scientific and technical associations, the general press of the country took the subject up and discussed it approvingly, and I may say enthusiastically, all over the country. I discover in the very convincing and comprehensive report made by the Secretary of Agriculture upon the feasibility of this scheme and its desirability from a national standpoint the names of 49 of the leading educational, religious, political, scientific, and technical newspapers of the country, all of them of national prominence and importance. Among these are such papers as the New York Tribune, Baltimore Sun, Providence Journal, Cleveland Leader, New York Lumber Trade Journal, Forest and Stream, St. Louis Star, Pittsburg Commercial Gazette, New York Herald, Knoxville Times, New Orleans Picayune, Indianapolis News, Chicago Times-Herald, and Scientific American. These publications speak in terms of the highest commendation of the movement as one of national interest and importance, and urge upon Congress immediate and favorable action.

Not only this, Mr. President, but, as the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW] stated on Saturday, the late President McKinley in a message to the Senate strongly advocated the establishment of this reservation, and the present Chief Executive, in a message to this Senate during this session, vigorously presses upon Congress the importance from a national standpoint of the establishment of this park. So I think it can safely be said that this is not a local scheme, but that it comes to Congress urged and indorsed by a great variety of interests in all parts of the country.

Now, what are the great national purposes to be subserved by the creation of this park? In connection with all questions looking to the preservation by the Government of forests there are two primal and overshadowing considerations. First, the protection from destruction of the national timber and wood and fuel supply; and, secondly, the effect of deforestation upon the climate, land erosion, and the regularity of the flow of streams as affecting agriculture, manufacturing, and commerce.

Mr. President, without crediting all the predictions of alarmists in reference to the destruction of our national supply of timber, it must be obvious to everybody that the available supply of timber in this country at large is rapidly disappearing. The amount of woodland area in 1880—I have not been able to get the correct data since then—in proportion to the total land area of the country was 37 per cent. Since that time we all know there have been cuttings and clearings for agricultural purposes and for lumber, which has greatly reduced the amount of this percentage, and to-day it is very much less than it was in 1880. I can only make an estimate—and that estimate I make after conferring with scientists familiar with this subject—and that is at present there is certainly not over 27 per cent of the total area of land in the United States that is covered by available timber land. In many sections of the country where fifty years ago there seemed to be an abundant supply of timber there is hardly enough left to-day to furnish firebote, woodbote, and housebote.

Mr. President, I do not pretend to speak with the confidence of a full and accurate knowledge as to general conditions in this country upon this subject, but I do claim to know something about the condition in my own State. Thirty-five years ago the great long leaf and loblolly pine forest of my State had been scarcely touched. They were in primal condition; they had only been cut for the purpose of supplying the limited demand of a sparsely settled agricultural community, and the supply seemed inexhaustible. On account of the great demand for lumber and the partial failure of the supply in other parts of the country, about twenty years ago the lumberman turned his attention to the South, and since that time there has been going on in my State a process of deforestation that threatens to destroy the great pine forests of that State.

The hard-wood region of my State, which is chiefly in the western and mountainous section, has been to some extent exempt from this process of denudation, because of its inaccessibility and the lack of transportation; but even in the mountain region of my State, along the railroads and streams, already much of the finest hard-wood timber has been cut, and I do not think I hazard anything in saying that, if this process continues as it has for the last two decades, in another generation, not only the pine forests, but the hard-wood forests of my State will have been robbed of all of their timber.

What has been going on in my State I believe has been going on in nearly every other State of the South during the last twenty years, and what has happened there has happened heretofore in most of the States of the Union.

The demand for lumber is so great that the only hope against the total destruction of the available lumber supply of the country is in the Government taking hold of this question and setting aside here and there great reservations, to be cut only when the timber is ripe, and then in limited quantities and under Government and expert supervision.

Mr. President, as important as the consideration of the preservation of the timber supply of the country is, there is another consideration of national importance, of more concern even than that, and that is the effect of the destruction especially of mountain forests upon navigation.

The effect of deforestation upon the regularity of water flow and the consequent navigability of streams is well known. This effect is much greater in streams in hilly and mountainous regions than in streams that have their rise and flow through coastal regions, but even in a comparatively level country the effect of deforestation upon land erosion and the regularity of the water flow is very frequently disastrous.

I have in mind as an illustration of this fact a certain river in my State, one of the largest rivers in that State, and the only large river in it which flows directly into the ocean. I refer to the Cape Fear River. Three generations ago, before deforestation began along the banks of that river, or before it had progressed to any considerable extent, that river was navigable all the year round 125 miles into the interior, up to the old historic town of Fayetteville, for light-draft ocean vessels drawing 5½ feet. Fayetteville was then a port of entry and a distributing point of a large part of Virginia, South Carolina, and Tennessee, as well as central and western North Carolina. The watershed of this river is rich and fertile, and in that time 75 per cent of it has been cleared, and most of the timber has been cut off of the other 25 per cent. As a result of this deforestation along that river, which runs through a comparatively level country, although it takes its rise in the foothills of my State, notwithstanding all the money that the Government has expended in dredging out the channel and in building jetties, its governing depth of water for eight months of the year is only 21 inches, as against 6 and 7 feet before this deforestation.

Recently that stream has been examined by an engineer of the Government for the purpose of ascertaining what it would cost and whether it is feasible to restore its original depth of water, and his report made to this Congress shows that it will cost $1,300,000 to restore the original depth of 6 or 8 feet the year round, and that it can only be done by a system of slack-water dams and locks, and this Congress has made an appropriation to begin the work of constructing these locks and dams. So that here is a case where, as the result of deforestation, the governing depth of the water in a stream has been reduced from 6 and 8 feet to 21 inches, and it will cost the Government one and a quarter millions dollars to restore that depth.

But, Mr. President, as great as are the effects of this deforestation upon streams running through hilly and lowland countries, it is infinitely greater in streams taking their rise in mountains, because of the greater elevation and the more rapid flow of the water as a result of that greater elevation.

I know nothing about it myself, but scientists who have investigated this question assert that if you remove the forest covering from the Southern Appalachian Mountains or from any other Southern mountains with as great a waterfall as they have there, a waterfall on the average of from 70 to 100 inches a year, the result will be the washing away of the land surface of these mountains, and they will become in a comparatively short time as barren as the mountains and the hills of Palestine and those of southern France have become under like circumstances. In this Southern Appalachian region it is the forest cover alone that protects the soils from erosion and preserves the regular flow of the streams.

In the far Western part of our country, where there is an almost total absence of forest, these effects do not follow because of the slight rainfall there, being from 5 to 20 inches a year. In New England, where there has been great deforestation, there is measurable protection from these results by the comparatively light rainfall, being only about one-half of that of the Southern Appalachian region, but there are other reasons why this result has not followed deforestation in New England and the North. In the New England and other Northern States as far west as Minnesota the glaciers have left innumerable lakes which serve as natural reservoirs for the storage of water and for regulating its flow in the streams, and everywhere over this surface have deposited deep beds of gravel and sand which possess a storage capacity for water almost equal to that of the lakes.

So influential are these two agencies that in many regions, even where the forest is largely removed, the streams have a fairly regular flow and the value of the water powers has been fairly maintained. Furthermore, in the cooler climate of this more northern region grasses grow with great vigor, and even on the cleared land surfaces they form a dense sod, which holds the soil in place, and as the rain descends it catches and holds the water until it soaks into the soil beneath, from which it emerges weeks or even, perhaps, months later.

As will be readily seen, such a favorable combination of conditions naturally preserves the regularity in the flow of the streams and prevents the erosion of the land surfaces, and consequently prevents the silting up of the streams. In this Southern Appalachian region, however, we have higher mountains, and hence steeper mountain slopes; we have a heavier rainfall than that in the New England and other Northern States; we have no lakes or other natural reservoir basins; no extensive deposits of sand or gravel such as the glaciers have elsewhere left; the grasses do not grow vigorously nor sod readily, and consequently they do not hold the soil and prevent its erosion as they do in New England. Hence, as soon as the forest is destroyed the erosion of the land surface begins and continues rapidly until the soil is removed and the hard-rock surface reached. Therefore, it is literally and absolutely true that the destruction of the forests in this Southern Appalachian region means the destruction of the streams, the destruction of the soils, and ultimately the destruction of the mountains themselves.

The process by which this protection is afforded by the forest covering is simple. The myriads of independent and separate raindrops are broken in their downward descent by contact with the twigs and leaves of the trees and fall in a spray on the surface vegetation below—the herbs, the flowers, the ferns, and grass—and is received by the porous humus, and thence soaks into the soil below. There it is held as in a reservoir, and finally, weeks and months later, passes off through the rock crevices into the basin of the watershed below, and thence into the ocean. By this gradual absorption, percolation, and outflow the moisture necessary to plant life and to health is preserved and the regularity of water flow maintained.

Now, remove the forest coverings from these mountain sides and summits, and these raindrops batter the soil in some instances into a hard, compact surface, over which the water flows in a sluice immediately into the drainway, and in other instances, according to the character of the soil, these raindrops batter the soil to pieces, and both soil and water are precipitated into the basin below. In both instances the water is, in a few hours after the rain falls, on its way to the sea. The first effect of this sudden precipitation of the rainfall into these mountain streams is an uncontrollable torrent, charged with the débris of mountain erosion, filling the channel of the stream with deposits of the heavier parts of this erosion, sweeping over its banks and distributing itself throughout the valley, washing away the valley surface where the soil is light and the fall greater, and depositing the light sand constituents of the erosion where the fall is less and the valley soil sufficiently firm to resist washing. In the first case the rich soil of the valley is washed away, and in the other it is covered with a sand as dry and lifeless as that of the desert.

The secondary effect of this sudden precipitation of water into the mountain streams is the loss of the water supply which, had it entered the soil by absorption, would have been held for weeks and months in reserve, furnishing needed moisture for vegetable life and gradually passing off into the natural drainway, so as to preserve the regularity of the water flow of the streams.

The effect of this erosion and these alternating floods, caused by deforestation, upon the navigation of the streams having their headwaters in mountain regions is self-evident. The deposits from this erosion are not confined to the upper sections of these streams, but extend downward throughout its whole length, finally silting up the harbors. The effect of these alternating freshets and droughts upon water power for industrial purposes is equally obvious, for the value of water for motive power depends not so much on the maximum supply as upon reasonable regularity in its flow.

In all the Eastern States water power is an important industrial asset. On the streams having their sources in this proposed forest reserve the power already developed represents an annual asset of $2,000,000 to $3,000,000 and operates manufacturing enterprises valued at $30,000,000. The remaining available but undeveloped 1,000,000 horsepower would represent an annual asset of $20,000,000 to $30,000,000 and would operate manufacturing plants valued at $300,000,000.

But owing to the absence of lakes and glacial gravels in the Southern Appalachian region the future maintenance of these values is inseparably connected with and dependent upon the preservation of the forests about the headwaters of these streams. This fact is illustrated by recent measurements of two streams in North Carolina; one of them with 90 per cent of its drainage area still forest covered had a greater dry-season flow of water than did the other with six and one-half times the drainage area, of which area only 25 per cent was forest covered and had only a slightly less rainfall.

Until a comparatively recent period the region embraced in the Southern Appalachian Mountains, where it is expected that this reserve will be located, was but sparsely settled, and its settlement was confined almost entirely to the valleys.

The advent of railroads in this section has brought about a change in these conditions. The population has greatly increased and is rapidly increasing. The valley lands have nearly all been cleared and brought into cultivation; the farmer and the lumberman have begun to encroach upon the mountain sides in search of more land and timber. It is estimated that now 24 per cent of the lands in this area have been either cleared for agricultural purposes or denuded of timber. As a result of this deforestation already the effects I have before described are beginning to be seen and seriously felt.

Last summer I traveled several hundred miles, partly by private conveyance, across these mountains and through these valleys. All along the route, here and there, far up on the mountain sides, with slopes ranging from 20 to 40 degrees, often so steep that cultivation was limited to the hoe, there were farm clearings. Everywhere on these slopes and in the mountain coves was the débris of the lumberman or of the bark hunter—for the bark hunter in that section has been about as destructive to the timber interests as the lumberman himself.

Some of these mountain-side farms were in cultivation, but many of them had been abandoned as worthless, and stood there barren and bleak, furnishing a water slope filled with gulleys and gorges, too poor for further cultivation, too poor and being washed away too rapidly to permit of its reproducing forest growth. The agricultural life of one of these clearings is, under varying conditions, from three to ten years. In that time the fertility of the soil has all been leached away, and it has become worthless and been abandoned.

On this trip I stood upon Whiteside Mountain, one of the finest summits in the Southern Appalachian region. It rises nearly 2,000 feet from the valley below. From the summit of this mountain I saw on the slopes of the nearest mountains about 25 of these mountain-side farms. Only about half a dozen of them, however, were in cultivation. Most of the balance had been worn out and abandoned and stood there desolate and bare, as they will probably stand until the end of time. The valleys through which I traveled were fertile, but the floods of that year had washed away the surface soil of many of those farms, rendering them almost valueless; and in other instances these rich bottoms were covered with a white sand, as dry and lifeless as the sands of the desert, the deposit of the floods. At one place I passed, while on this trip, for nearly a mile down the valley of the Catawba, and on either side of this stream at this point the valley was covered with a sand bank from 3 to 7 feet deep.

I was told before the flood which left this deposit these valley lands were worth $100 an acre. After the flood they were not worth 100 cents. In one of the near-by counties to the section I visited the very freshet which had deposited this sand bank in the rich valley of the Catawba had left hundreds of people desolate, had swept away their stock, their fences, their houses, and destroyed their crops. In another county a later flood came near sweeping away the whole town of Marshall, in which my colleague lives. It did actually sweep away his office and destroyed his valuable law library.

The damage done to agricultural lands and other property along the streams rising in the Southern Appalachian region by floods in the summer of 1901 is estimated by the Secretary of Agriculture to have been not less than $10,000,000. "Along one river in North Carolina, the Catawba, to which I have before referred, bridges, mills, crops, and farm lands for 200 miles, valued at $1,500,000 were swept away by the storms of May and August, 1901."

"In one valley in Mitchell County, to which I have before referred in general terms, a valley largely cleared of forests, the storm of last May wrought damages estimated at more than $500,000." The damage to the property of the Southern Railway, which penetrates these mountains in various directions, by these storms during the last twelve months is estimated at more than $1,000,000, while its loss in traffic was also large. The storms of December, January, and February just passed have rivaled those of the spring and summer of 1901 in destructiveness. It is estimated by competent authority that the total damages of all kinds along these mountain streams during the past twelve months exceed $18,000,000. I give below a detailed statement of this estimate, which will show how widespread and extensive were these damages, affecting the people of more than half a dozen States. These estimates have been made with great care by men who are familiar with each of these regions and who have investigated this matter with considerable thoroughness.

Storm damages on streams rising in the proposed Appalachian forest reserve between April, 1901, and April, 1902.

Kanawha, adjacent streams (in Virginia and West Virginia)	$1,500,000
Roanoke, James, etc. (in Virginia)	1,000,000
Watauga (in North Carolina and Tennessee)	2,000,000
Nolichucky (in North Carolina and Tennessee)	2,000,000
French Broad (in North Carolina and Tennessee)	1,500,000
Tuckaseegee and Hiawassee	1,500,000
Broad, Saluda, and Catawba (in South Carolina)	1,000,000
Yadkin, Dan, and Roanoke (in North Carolina)	1,000,000
Catawba (in North Carolina)	2,000,000
Savannah and Chattahoochee (in Georgia)	1,500,000
Coosa (in Georgia and Alabama)	2,000,000
Tennessee and other tributaries	1,000,000
Total	18,000,000

Both tradition and records show that there have been storms in this Southern Appalachian region at intervals during the past one hundred years perhaps as violent as those of the past twelve months, but never before have such floods and such damages resulted. During the few past decades, and even during the past few years, the floods have been increasing in violence and destructiveness, and almost in proportion as the forest destruction has progressed. And these have been greater in those regions where the cleared land was in largest proportion.

As this deforestation progresses, as it will progress with the increase of population and the lumbering in this section, the loss from these floods will also increase. The fact that these disastrous floods are the direct result of deforestation is supported both by theory and ample and indisputable data. Until recent years no such results have followed even the heaviest and longest-continued rainfall.

Now, Mr. President, the effects of this deforestation are not local. The destruction of land and of property from this cause, it is true, is greater in the mountain and the adjacent plateau regions, but the effects extend to the very mouth of the streams which take their rise in these mountains. The river channels are being silted up all the way to the harbor on the coast; the water powers which extend along these streams for from 100 hundred to 200 miles from their sources are gradually losing their value, and the farm bordering these streams for even greater distances are being destroyed both by floods and by washing.

This applies to all of the great rivers of the South Atlantic States—the Potomac, the James, the Roanoke, the Pedee, the Congaree, the Altamaha—and to other important rivers emptying directly or indirectly into the Gulf, such as the Chattahoochee, the Alabama, the Tennessee, and the Kanawha, which is one of the most important tributaries of the Ohio.

Mr. BACON. You omitted to name the Savannah River.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; the Savannah is another important river taking its rise in these mountains, and there are others I have not named. The Blue Ridge Mountains is the great divide between those which flow northeastward, eastward, or southeastward into the Atlantic and those which flow southward, westward, and northwestward, ultimately reaching the Gulf.

Can it be said that a proposition which affects so intimately the agriculture and the manufacturing of the immediate and adjacent locality, which affects the navigation and the commerce of these great water highways, penetrating a dozen States of the Union, is not a national question? A considerable portion of these lands are located in North Carolina, but the streams which take their rise there spread out and pass through or border nearly all the Southern States and Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois.

Even if North Carolina were able to do what we are now asking the Government to do (and of course it is not, because it would require the entire revenue of the State for several years to purchase the land), it should not be required to do it, because the benefit resulting from the work will be as great to the other States through which these streams run as to North Carolina. It is true that New York and Pennsylvania are establishing local forest reserves, but these will protect the sources of streams lying wholly within their borders, and the benefit is local, confined to the State in which the forest is situated.

Mr. President, I do not desire to detain the Senate to discuss another important phase of this question except in a very general way: That of the establishment of a great national health and pleasure resort. This is a subordinate purpose in the establishment of this great forest reserve, but it is none the less an important one. We all know how rapidly the country is being settled, how population is increasing, how rapidly its lands are being cleared and brought under cultivation, and it is obvious that something should be done to preserve here and there a spot where the tired and weary toiler can come in touch with primeval nature and can find rest and fresh air and space in which to recuperate his exhausted energies. There is not a national park in the whole Eastern region, the nearest being the Yellowstone Park, 2,000 miles away, and there is not a national forest reserve this side of the Dakotas, about 1,800 miles away.

The proposed forest reserve will be within twenty-four hours' ride of more than half the population of the United States—the great cities of New York, Philadelphia, Chicago, and the populous region of the whole North and Central West, as well as the South. It is one of the most beautiful spots upon the earth. On the west are the high summits of the Smoky and the Unaka mountains, and irregularly parallel on the east is the Blue Ridge, while there are hundreds of cross ridges rising from five to more that six thousand feet above the sea level, with valleys and plateaus and table-lands intersected with mountain brooks and streams. Seventy-five per cent of this region is still covered with forests which are generally conceded to be greater in variety and extent than any other hard-wood or broad-leaved forests on the continent.

Many of these mountain slopes and ravines have never yet been invaded by the man with the ax. The mingling here in vigorous growth of the trees and shrubs of Canada with those of the extreme Southern States shows how well adapted is this region in general climatic conditions as a meeting ground for people from all portions of this country. Its light air, which in the valleys is fairly dry, and its salubrious and invigorating climate make it a Mecca for the sick, the tired, and the weary.

The American people as a whole are great lovers of nature, and this tendency should be encouraged. Now more than ever our children, even in their kindergarten days, are taught to see and understand the natural life about them. Our forefathers enjoyed the wild woods of this country, and we of to-day take pleasure in visiting, when we can find them, forests and streams as our forefathers saw them.

We may not now appreciate fully this phase of the subject, but before the present century has passed there will be in this country east of the Mississippi River a hundred million people, and unless some such measure as that now proposed is adopted by this Government there will then be within all this region but few acres of that original forest to be found. As we look forward to these increasing millions, it is one of our duties to anticipate their needs and wishes, and for this they will be grateful, just as we now are grateful for the blessings which our forefathers left to us. With these increasing millions there will be the increasing need for such places of recreation and rest. We have now the opportunity of doing so without great cost, and I think it is our duty to perpetuate these wonderful forests and streams which if once destroyed are destroyed forever, but which if now preserved can be easily perpetuated, the benefits of which protection begin at once and continue indefinitely.

In short, Mr. President, the establishment of this reserve will protect from the vandalism of avarice the finest hard-wood forests on the continent; its proper management under trained Government foresters will not only perpetuate a supply of valuable hard-wood timber but will also work an incalculable benefit as a perpetual object lesson in showing to the American people how such a forest can be utilized by succeeding generations without being destroyed; it will preserve the regular flow of these numerous and large mountain streams, thus protecting from inundation and destruction the fertile agricultural lands bordering these streams through many States. It will preserve unimpaired for indefinite time the many valuable water powers on these various streams, thus sustaining great and varied manufacturing interests.

It will greatly benefit the commerce of all this portion of the country by continuing the navigability of its numerous rivers; and finally it will supply the need, already beginning to be felt, and which will be felt more and more every year, for a great sanitarium where the tired and weary thousands and even millions can for a time get out of the increasing rush of American business life, and in the natural quiet of this great forest, in touch with its picturesque mountains and beautiful streams, breathing its heathful, invigorating air, renew their strength and energies, and thus prolong their lives and labors.

Mr. President, I do not desire to detain the Senate further in the discussion of this question. But I wish to say that if the members of the Senate could see that country as I have seen it, could behold with their own eyes and not with the eyes of another the effects of deforestation upon the agriculture and the commerce and the water power of the streams rising in those mountains, if they could see the surpassing beauty and grandeur of that wild and weird country I do not think there would be a single vote cast in this Chamber against the pending bill, and I sincerely trust there will not be a single vote cast against it.

Mr. President, one other remark personal to myself. Unfortunately I was not in the Senate on Saturday when the junior Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW] delivered his very eloquent, forcible, and illuminating speech upon this subject, and when it was suggested that a vote might possibly be taken. To my prejudice it has been reported in the press of my State—and I speak of this in the nature of a matter of personal privilege—that my absence from the Chamber at that time, and the fact that I had given notice that I would speak to-day, prevented a vote, and that a golden opportunity for the passage of a bill in which the people of my State are greatly interested was lost. I wish to say that I was not responsible for the failure to take a vote at that time, if there was an opportune occasion, further than the fact that I had given notice that I would make a speech to-day. I wish to state, furthermore, that I am informed by two Senators who have been deeply interested in this question that they would not have permitted a vote to have been taken then because they desired to hear further argument and elucidation before casting their votes. I have said this simply that my absence on Saturday, which was unavoidable, might not be subject to misconstruction in my own State.

TELEPHONE SERVICE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, several days ago I gave notice that at the conclusion of the routine morning business to-day I would move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12865) regulating the use of telephone wires in the District of Columbia, an important measure. I see that it is impossible to consider it this morning, and I wish it understood that at the earliest opportunity I will move to take it up for consideration.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 14046) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill. The first amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, under the subhead "Pay of the Navy," on page 2, line 14, to increase the total appropriation for pay of the Navy from $16,138,199 to $16,327,699.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, after line 15, to insert:

ADDITIONAL ROOM FOR THE NAVY DEPARTMENT.

The Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to rent a suitable fireproof building, containing not exceeding approximately 60,000 square feet of floor space, in the vicinity of the State, War, and Navy Department building for the use of the Navy Department for the six months ending June 30, 1903, and the following sums are appropriated therefor: Rent, $11,375; heating and lighting, $2,600; in all, $13,975.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Bureau of Navigation," on page 6, after line 19, to strike out:

Maintenance of colliers: Pay, transportation, shipping, and subsistence of civilian officers and crews of naval colliers, and all expenses connected with naval colliers employed in emergencies which can not be paid from other appropriations, $350,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, after line 6, to insert:

Naval training station, Great Lakes: The Secretary of the Navy is hereby directed to appoint a board, composed of naval officers, whose duty it shall be to select a suitable site for an additional naval training station, and, having selected such site, if upon private lands, to estimate its value and ascertain, as nearly as practicable, the cost for which it can be purchased or acquired, and of their proceedings and action to make full and detailed report to the Secretary, who shall transmit such report with his recommendations thereon to Congress for its action. And to defray the expenses of said board the sum of $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be immediately available, is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. HALE. In line 7 there is a mistake. The words "Great Lakes" should be stricken out.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Bureau of Equipment," on page 17, line 14, after the word "war," to strike out "$640,000" and insert:

Including the purchase of necessary land, $640,000: Provided, That the unexpended balance of former appropriations made for the establishment of naval coal depots shall be available for purchase of land, and the accounting officers of the Treasury Department are hereby authorized and directed to allow, in the settlement of the accounts of disbursing officers of the Government, all expenditures heretofore made for land purchased for use as naval coal depots.

So as to make the clause read:

Depots for coal: To enable the Secretary of the Navy to execute the provisions of section 1552 of the Revised Statutes, authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to establish, at such places as he may deem necessary, suitable depots for coal and other fuel, for the supply of steamships of war, including the purchase of necessary land, $640,000: Provided, That the unexpended balance of former appropriations made for the establishment of naval coal depots shall be available for purchase of land, and the accounting officers of the Treasury Department are hereby authorized and directed to allow, in the settlement of the accounts of disbursing officers of the Government, all expenditures heretofore made for land purchased for use as naval coal depots.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 17, after line 23, to insert:

Maintenance of colliers: Pay, transportation, shipping, and subsistence of civilian officers and crews of naval colliers, and all expenses connected with naval colliers employed in emergencies which can not be paid from other appropriations, $350,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Civil establishment," on page 18, line 15, to increase the appropriation for the salary of one clerk in the Bureau of Equipment, navy-yard, Portsmouth, N. H., from $1,000 to $1,200; and, in line 17, to increase the total appropriation for the maintenance of the Bureau of Equipment, navy-yard, Portsmouth, N. H., from $1,950 to $2,150.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 18, line 21, after the word "dollars," to strike out "1 writer" and insert "2 writers;" in line 22, after the word "dollars," to insert "each," and in line 23, before the word "in," to strike out "1 writer, at $950;" so as to make the clause read:

Navy-yard, Boston, Mass.: For 1 superintendent of ropewalk, at $1,875; 1 clerk, at $1,400; 1 clerk, at $1,300; 2 writers, at $950 each; in all $6,475.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 19, line 2, after the word "dollars," to strike out "1 writer, at $950; 1 writer" and insert "2 writers;" in line 4, after the word "dollars," to insert "each;" in line 5, before the word "in," to strike out "1 custodian of books, at $1,200," and in line 6, before the word "hundred," to strike out "five thousand seven" and insert "four thousand five;" so as to make the clause read:

Navy-yard, New York, N. Y.: For 1 clerk, at $1,400; 1 clerk, at $1,200; 2 writers, at $950 each; in all, $4,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 20, line 9, to reduce the total appropriation for the civil establishment, Bureau of Equipment, from $31,202.52 to $30,202.52.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Bureau of Yards and Docks," on page 26, after line 19, to insert:

That there may be appointed under the provisions of section 1413 of the Revised Statutes 33 civil engineers: Provided, That no more than three such appointments, in addition to appointments made to fill vacancies arising in course, shall be made in any one calendar year.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 28, line 4, after the word "dollars," to insert:

To enable the Secretary of the Navy to make an examination concerning the fresh-water supply at the Portsmouth Navy-Yard, $500, or so much thereof as may be needed, said examination to include a survey of the ponds which constitute the sources of the aqueduct, an ascertainment of the quality of the water, an inquiry as to its sufficiency for all future needs, and an estimate of the value of the aqueduct, dams, and ponds; and said Secretary shall consider the desirability of controlling, by purchase or otherwise, solely for the use of the Government, the whole water supply, and he shall make such recommendations on the subject as he may deem expedient to Congress at its next session; for the removal of Hendersons Point, near the navy-yard, Portsmouth, N. H., in accordance with the project recommended in House Document No. 243, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session, $200,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy: Provided, That a contract or contracts may be entered into by the Secretary of the Navy for such materials and work as may be necessary to prosecute said project, to be paid for as appropriations may from time to time be made by law, not to exceed in the aggregate $549,000, exclusive of the amounts herein and heretofore appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 29, line 3, to increase the total appropriation for "Public works, Bureau of Yards and Docks, navy-yards and stations, Naval Academy, and new Naval Observatory" from $672,075 to $872,575.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 33, after line 5, to insert:

Condemnation of land adjacent to the Norfolk Navy-Yard: The Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be commenced, within three months after the passage of this act, and the Attorney-General is hereby directed to carry on, proceedings for the condemnation of the following tract of land, for the use of the United States for the Norfolk Navy-Yard, and for other purposes, namely: A tract of land known as the Schmolles property, containing some 272.4 acres, more or less, in Norfolk County, Va., and adjacent to the Norfolk Navy-Yard, under the act Congress approved August 1, 1888, entitled "An act to authorize the condemnation of lands for sites of public buildings, and for other purposes," and other laws of the United States, so as to completely vest in the United States the title of said land. And all such proceedings shall be reported to Congress at its next session by the Secretary of the Navy.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 34, line 2, after the word "dollars," to insert "purchase of land, twenty-five thousand nine hundred and fifty;" and in line 5, before the word "dollars," to strike out "ninety-three thousand" and insert "one hundred and eighteen thousand nine hundred and fifty;" so as to make the clause read:

Naval station, Key West, Fla.: Quay wall, to continue, $50,000; coaling pier, to complete, $23,000; concrete cisterns, $20,000; purchase of land, $25,950; in all, naval station, Key West, $118,950.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Navy-yard, Puget Sound, Washington," on page 35, line 9, before the word "thousand," to strike out "two" and insert "four," and in the same line, after the word "dollars," to insert "or so much thereof as may be necessary;" so as to read:

Purchase of land, $4,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was on page 36, line 6, to increase the total appropriation for the navy-yard, Puget Sound, Washington, from $808,500 to $810,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Naval Station, Tutuila," on page 37, line 7, after the word "Samoa," to insert "to be immediately available;" so as to read:

Purchase of additional land at Samoa, to be immediately available, $35,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 37, line 14, before the word "removal," to strike out "susceptibility to," and insert "the practicability of its;" so as to make the clause read:

Port Royal Naval Station, S. C.: The Secretary of the Navy is directed to investigate and report to the next session of Congress the state and condition of the Government property at Port Royal, S. C.; its value and the practicability of its removal to another navy-yard, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 37, line 21, before the word "Charleston," to strike out "naval station" and insert "navy-yard;" in line 24, before the word "Charleston," to strike out "naval station" and insert "navy-yard," and in line 25, after the word "dollars," to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That the amount authorized in the act of June 7, 1900, to be expended for the purchase of a site for a naval station at or in the vicinity of Charleston, S. C., from the appropriation for a new naval station and a dock be increased from $100,000 to $106,000.

So as to make the clause read:

Navy-yard, Charleston, S. C.: Stone and concrete dry dock (toward completion), $250,000; in all, navy-yard, Charleston, S. C., $250,000: Provided, That the amount authorized in the act of June 7, 1900, to be expended for the purchase of a site for a naval station at or in the vicinity of Charleston, S. C., from the appropriation for a new naval station and a dock be increased from $100,000 to $106,000.

Mr. HALE. I move, at the end of line 5, to add the words:

And $6,000 is hereby appropriated.

The words were left out by mistake.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 38, after line 5, to insert:

For developing the United States navy-yard at Charleston, S. C., the following sums are appropriated:

Mr. HALE. On page 38, at the end of line 7, I move to insert what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 38, at the end of line 7, insert:

Office building for the commandant, $35,000; quarters for the commandant, $12,000; quarters for civil engineer, $7,500; landing and wharves, $50,000; grading and drainage, $10,000; workshop (to cost $80,000), $50,000; storehouse and storekeeper's office, $50,000; equipment building (to cost $125,000), $62,500; machine shop for steam engineering (to cost $174,000), $80,000; foundry and copper shop for steam engineer (to cost $118,000), $60,000; power house (to cost $50,000), $25,000; workshop for ordnance, $40,300; ship fitters' shop, with mold loft and furnace for construction and repair (to cost $200,000), $50,000; power house and fuel storage for construction and repair (to cost $80,000), $35,000; machine shop for construction and repair (to cost $120,000), $40,000; joiners' shop for construction and repair (to cost $120,000), $30,000; foundry for construction and repair (to cost $75,000), $20,000; in all, $657,300.

In all cases where buildings and structure are provided for in this act, and where appropriations in full are not made for the same, authority is hereby given to the Secretary of the Navy, in his discretion, to enter into contracts for the entire construction of such buildings and structures, with the limit of cost as fixed in this act.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. MALLORY. I should like to inquire if the bill is now open to general amendment, or if only the committee amendments are being acted upon?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Only the committee amendments are now being considered.

The next amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, on page 39, line 1, to increase the total appropriation for public works in the Navy from $6,696,075 to $6,924,525.

Mr. HALE. I move to change the total so as to read "$7,649,325."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Public works, Bureau of Navigation," in the appropriation for the Naval Academy, on page 39, line 18, after the word "improvements," to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy may, in his discretion, continue the said improvements at the Naval Academy, either by contract or day labor, or both, as he may deem necessary for the best interests of the Government.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Naval Observatory," on page 44, line 2, to increase the appropriation for grounds and roads, etc., from $5,000 to $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 44, after line 2, to insert:

For the expenses of the Board of Visitors to the Naval Observatory, $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 44, after line 4, to insert:

Additional numbers of the American Ephemeris and Nautical Almanac: Hereafter there shall be published in addition to the present publications of the American Ephemeris and Nautical Almanac 2,500 copies, 500 of which shall be for the use of the Senate, 1,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 1,000 for distribution or sale by the Navy Department.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Bureau of Medicine and Surgery," on page 46, after line 4, to insert:

Naval hospital, Mare Island, Cal.: Repairs and improvements in fitting up old buildings and building new; for changing officers' quarters into wards for enlisted men and building quarters for officers outside naval hospital, $20,000; for construction of a contagious-disease hospital, $10,000; in all, $30,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Navy-yard, Norfolk, Va.," page 53, line 21, after the word "dollars," to insert "each;" so as to read:

Two receiving clerks, at $942 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 16, on page 54.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

Mr. HALE. I ask that it may be temporarily laid aside. We can get this bill through in a few moments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside, and that the Senate proceed with the consideration of the appropriation bill.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I dislike very much to object to regular business of the Senate, but as I have given notice that I wish to make some remarks on the canal bill, I should like very much to go on with them.

Mr. HALE. We can finish this bill in a very short time.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not think the interests of the appropriation bill will suffer by the delay of one day.

Mr. HALE. I have never known where an appropriation bill was nearly finished and when there was plenty of time for other measures——

Mr. HARRIS. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine about how long he thinks it would take?

Mr. HALE. Not over half an hour:

Mr. HARRIS. Then I yield for that purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business, then, is temporarily laid aside for one-half hour, in order that the Senate may proceed with the consideration of the appropriation bill.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have just been advised by a Senator on this side that he will talk for half an hour at least on the naval appropriation bill. The Senator from Kansas gave notice the other day that he would desire to speak on the isthmian canal bill at 2 o'clock to-day. It is always the custom when a notice of that kind has been given to conform to it. I hope the Senator from Maine will give way. There will be plenty of time to get the appropriation bill through.

Mr. HALE. I had just, as I thought, very successfully made this arrangement with the Senator from Kansas himself. I shall not undertake to go on for over a half an hour.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator from Maine announced that the bill could be finished in half an hour, and I am advised by one of my friends on my right that he himself will speak for at least half an hour.

Mr. HALE. He may speak but ten minutes. We will wait and see. I do not want to shut anyone off, but everyone understands that when we get an appropriation bill going everything gives way. I do not want to interfere with the Senator from Kansas if it is any inconvenience to him, but he has agreed that we might run along for half an hour.

Mr. HARRIS. I was willing to yield for half an hour.

Mr. HALE. I shall not go on any longer than that time to-day.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, under the subhead "Supplies and Accounts," on page 54, after line 24, to insert:

That the active list of the Pay Corps of the Navy shall hereafter consist of 13 pay directors, 16 pay inspectors, 70 paymasters, not less than 23 of whom shall be of the grade of lieutenant-commander, and 80 passed assistant and assistant paymasters: Provided, That assistant paymasters, after three years' service as such, shall, after passing the examination required by law, be eligible to promotion to passed assistant paymasters.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment, was under the subhead "Bureau of Construction and Repair," on page 59, after line 2, to insert:

That hereafter the number of naval constructors and assistant naval constructors shall not exceed 60: Provided, That no more than three assistant naval constructors, in addition to those appointed to fill vacancies arising in course, shall be appointed in any one calendar year.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Pay of professors and others, Naval Academy," on page 63, line 7, after the word "dollars," to insert:

One assistant librarian, at $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 66, after line 24, to insert:

That hereafter the corps of midshipmen at the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis shall consist of 1 from each Congressional district, 1 from each Territory, 1 from the District of Columbia, 2 from each State at large, and 15 from the United States at large. They shall be appointed by the President and shall, with the exception of the 15 midshipmen appointed from the United States at large, be actual residents of the Congressional or Territorial districts, or of the the District of Columbia, or of the States, respectively, from which they are appointed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 67, after line 9, to insert:

That hereafter all examinations for admission to the United States Naval Academy of midshipmen, as hereinbefore provided, shall be at Annapolis, Md., by a board of examiners to be taken from the officers and instructors at said Academy to be selected by the Secretary of the Navy.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 67, line 15, to increase the total appropriation for the Naval Academy from $229,905.77 to $230,905.77.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 67, after line 22, to strike out:

That sections 8, 9, and 10 of the act approved March 3, 1899, entitled "An act to reorganize and increase the efficiency of the personnel of the Navy and Marine Corps of the United States," are hereby repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Marine Corps," on page 68, after line 6, to insert:

That from and after the date of the approval of this act the commandant of the Marine Corps shall have the rank and pay of a major-general in the Army, and when a vacancy shall occur in the office of commandant of the corps, on the expiration of the service of the present incumbent, by retirement or otherwise, the commandant of the Marine Corps shall thereafter have the rank and pay of a brigadier-general.

Mr. HALE. In line 9, after the word "pay," I move to insert "and allowances;" and also in line 13, after the word "pay," to insert "and allowances."

Mr. GALLINGER. Striking out the word "and" after "rank."

Mr. HALE. Striking out the word "and" after "rank."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 68, line 24, to increase the total appropriation for pay of noncommissioned officers, musicians, and privates, as prescribed by law, etc., from $1,112,548 to $1,236,028.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 69, after line 2, to insert:

In addition to the enlisted force of the Marine Corps now authorized by law there may be enlisted 10 gunnery sergeants, 40 sergeants, 60 corporals, 10 drummers, 10 trumpeters, and 620 privates.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 71, line 17, to increase the appropriation for provisions for the Marine Corps from $396,071.50 to $445,071.50.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 72, line 5, to increase the appropriation for clothing for the Marine Corps from $340,000 to $382,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 73, line 1, to increase the appropriation for military stores of the Marine Corps from $40,297 to $50,297.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 75, line 24, to increase the appropriation for contingent expenses of the Marine Corps from $91,700 to $103,700.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Public works—Marine Corps," on page 76, line 10, after the word "dollars," to insert "improvements, sewers, plumbing, etc., marine barracks, navy-yard, Boston, Mass., $1,500," and on page 77, line 3, to increase the total appropriation for public works under Marine Corps from $145,500 to $147,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 77, after line 3, to insert:

All contracts of the Carnegie Steel Company, Limited, heretofore made between it and the United States, shall be completed by its successor, the Carnegie Steel Company, or its lawful successor, which has acquired and assumed, or may acquire and assume, all of its assets and all of its liabilities under the said contracts. And the said Carnegie Steel Company, or its lawful successor, upon giving security in proper form and amount, conditioned for the performance by it of the said contracts according to the true intent and meaning thereof, shall be substituted therein for the said Carnegie Steel Company, Limited, and be entitled to exercise all rights thereunder which the said Carnegie Steel Company, Limited, had or would have had if it had continued in existence.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Increase of the Navy," on page 77, after line 17, to strike out:

That for the purpose of further increasing the naval establishment of the United States the President is hereby authorized to have constructed by contract, except as herein otherwise provided, two first-class battle ships carrying the heaviest armor and most powerful ordnance for vessels of their class upon a trial displacement of about 16,000 tons, and to have the highest practicable speed and great radius of action, and to cost when built by contract, exclusive of armor and armament, not exceeding $4,212,000 each; two first-class armored cruisers of about 14,500 tons trial displacement, carrying the heaviest armor and most powerful armament for vessels of their class, and to have the highest practicable speed and great radius of action, and to cost, when built by contract, exclusive of armor and armament, not exceeding $4,659,000 each; two gunboats of about 1,000 tons trial displacement, to cost, when built by contract, exclusive of armament, not exceeding $382,000 each; and the contract for the construction of each of said vessels so contracted for shall be awarded by the Secretary of the Navy to the lowest best responsible bidder, having in view the best results and most expeditious delivery: Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy shall build at least one of the battle ships, one of the armored cruisers, and one of the gunboats herein authorized in such Government navy-yard or navy-yards as he may designate, and for the purpose of preparing and equipping such navy-yard or navy-yards as may be so designated for the construction of such ships the sum of $175,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for each of the navy-yards in which the Secretary of the Navy may direct any such ship or ships to be built.

The Secretary of the Navy is hereby instructed to keep an accurate account of the cost of inspection and construction of such ship or ships, whether built in Government yards or by contract, and report thereon to Congress at each session the progress of work and cost thereof, including the inspection of all the material going into the construction of such ship or ships, and upon the completion thereof to report a full and detailed statement showing the relative cost of inspection and construction in Government yards and by contract: Provided further, The Secretary of the Navy shall build all the vessels herein authorized in such navy-yards as he may designate, should it reasonably appear that the persons, firms, or corporations, or the agents thereof, bidding for the construction of any of said vessels, have entered into any combination, agreement, or understanding, the effect, object, or purpose of which is to deprive the Government of fair, open, and unrestricted competition in letting contracts for the construction of any of said vessels.

And in lieu thereof insert:

That for the purpose of further increasing the naval establishment of the United States, the President is hereby authorized to have constructed by contract two first-class battle ships, carrying the heaviest armor and most powerful ordnance for vessels of their class upon a trial displacement of not more than 16,000 tons, and to have the highest practicable speed and great radius of action, and to cost, exclusive of armor and armament, not exceeding $4,212,000 each; two first-class armored cruisers of not more than 14,500 tons trial displacement, carrying the heaviest armor and most powerful armament for vessels of their class, and to have the highest practicable speed and great radius of action, and to cost, exclusive of armor and armament, not exceeding $4,659,000 each; two gunboats of about 1,000 tons trial displacement, to cost when built, exclusive of armament, not exceeding $382,000 each, and the contract for the construction of each of said vessels shall be awarded, by the Secretary of the Navy, to the lowest best responsible bidder, having in view the best results and most expeditious delivery; and in the construction of all of said vessels the provisions of the act of August 3, 1886, entitled "An act to increase the naval establishment," as to materials for said vessels, their engines, boilers, and machinery, the contracts under which they are built, the notice of any proposals for the same, the plans, drawings, specifications therefor, and the methods of executing said contracts shall be observed and followed, and, subject to the provisions of this act, all such vessels shall be built in compliance with the terms of said act, and in all their parts shall be of domestic machinery; and not more than two of the six battle ships, armored cruisers, and gunboats provided for in this act shall be built by one contracting party. One battle ship or one armored cruiser herein provided for shall be built on or near the coast of the Pacific Ocean or the waters connecting therewith; but if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the President from the bidding for such contracts that said vessel can not be constructed on or near the coast of the Pacific Ocean at a cost not exceeding 4 per cent above the lowest accepted bid for the corresponding vessel provided for in this act, he shall authorize the construction of said vessel elsewhere in the United States, subject to the limitations as to cost hereinbefore provided; and if the Secretary of the Navy shall be unable to contract at reasonable prices for the construction of any of the vessels herein authorized, then he may build such vessel or vessels in such navy-yards as he may designate.

Mr. HALE. Let that amendment be passed over. The Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] desires to make a few remarks upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be passed over.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 81, after line 19, to insert:

Additional submarine boats: That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized and required to contract with the Holland Torpedo Boat Company for five of its most improved type of submarine torpedo boats, to be built under the plans and specifications of said company, at a cost not to exceed the price contracted to be paid for the Holland boats now being built for the Navy Department: Provided, That no contract shall be made with the said company until one of the Holland boats now being built for the Department shall have been accepted by the Secretary of the Navy.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 82, after line 6, to insert the following:

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to have tested any completed submarine boat or boats, other than the Holland type, that may be presented to him for trial within six months after the passage of this act, and if he shall find by said tests that any of the said boats, if more than one is presented, shall be equal or superior to the best submarine torpedo boat which shall then be in use in the Navy, he is authorized, in his discretion, to purchase the best one of the said boats at a price not exceeding $170,000.

Mr. HALE. I move to strike out the words "Sec. 2," at the beginning of line 7.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. In line 11, after the word "if," I move to insert "one or;" so as to read:

and if he shall find by said tests that any of the said boats, if one or more than one is presented, shall be equal, etc.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

Mr. HALE. I have a few committee amendments to offer, and then I will get out of the way of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. HARRIS]. On page 4, at the end of line 15, I move to insert what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, after the word "dollars," at the end of line 15, it is proposed to strike out the period, and insert a colon, and the following:

Provided, That the accounting officers of the Treasury are hereby authorized and directed to allow, in the settlement of the accounts of disbursing officers involved, payments made under the appropriation "Emergency fund" to civilian employees appointed by the Navy Department for duty in and serving at naval stations maintained in the island possessions during the fiscal year 1902, and until such time as Congress shall make specific appropriation for the pay of such employees.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. Immediately following that, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Following the amendment just adopted, it is proposed to insert:

The Secretary of the Navy, in his discretion, is authorized to pay all civilian employees appointed for duty in the Philippine, Hawaiian, and Samoan islands, the island of Guam, and the island of Porto Rico, from the date of their sailing from the United States until they report for duty to the officer under whom they are to serve, and while returning to the United States, by the most direct route and with due expedition, a per diem compensation corresponding to their pay while actually employed; and in cases where the appointee is not to fill an existing vacancy his pay while traveling may be charged to the annual appropriation of the bureau concerned.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. On page 15, after line 9, I move to insert what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 15, after line 9, it is proposed to insert the following:

Naval station, Cavite, P. I.: For 1 clerk, $1,400.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I move to change the total, on page 15, lines 10 and 11, from "$41,006.75" to "$42,406.75."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. On page 31, after the word "dollars," in line 5, I move to insert what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 31, line 5, after the word "dollars," it is proposed to insert:

Reconstructing building No. 19 (to cost $185,000), to continue, $60,000; extension to dispensary building, $1,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I move to change the total of the appropriation in that clause from "$499,000" to "$560,500."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. On page 38, at the end of line 20, I move to insert what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 38, at the end of line 20, it is proposed to insert:

HARBOR, ISLAND OF GUAM.

Improving harbor of San Luis d'Apra, island of Guam, $150,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy in the prosecution of the project recommended by him for dredging a channel across the reef near Fort Santa Cruz and removing the top of the coral reef in the outer anchorage.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I move to change the total appropriation in lines 1 and 2, on page 39, from "$7,649,325" to "$7,799,325."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. On page 39, line 12, before the word "hundred," I move to strike out "one" and insert "two;" so as to make the appropriation $200,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. On page 58, after line 23, I move to insert what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 58, after line 23, it is proposed to insert:

Naval station, Cavite, Philippine Islands: One clerk to naval constructor, $1,400; 2 clerks at $1,200 each; in all, $3,800.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I move to change the total appropriation in that clause from "$25,824.25" to "$29,624.25."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. On page 60, after line 6, I move to insert what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 60, after line 6, it is proposed to insert:

Contingent, Bureau of Steam Engineering: For contingencies, drawing materials, and instruments for the drafting room, $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. On page 61, after line 9, I move to insert what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 61, after line 9, it is proposed to insert:

Toward the construction of a building on land owned by the Government at Annapolis, for an experiment station and testing laboratory in the department of marine engineering and naval construction (at a cost not to exceed $250,000), and the complete equipment of the same with all the necessary appliances and apparatus (at a cost not to exceed $150,000), $200,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. On page 62, after line 16, I move to insert what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 62, after line 16, it is proposed to insert:

Naval station, Cavite, P. I.: One writer, $1,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. In lines 17 and 18, on page 62, I move to change the total from "$17,900" to "$19,100."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] has called my attention to an amendment which should be made. On page 64, line 24, after the words "training of," I move to strike out "naval cadets" and insert "midshipmen." That is to correspond with the law.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. On page 65, line 3, after the words "instruction of," I move to strike out "cadets" and insert "midshipmen."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I am obliged to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. HARRIS] for deferring to me. The bill is now finished except one amendment, and I give notice that I shall call up the bill tomorrow morning after the routine morning business.

ISTHMIAN CANAL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3110) to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I suggest the lack of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Allison,	Cullom,	Heitfeld,	Perkins,
Bacon,	Daniel,	Jones, Ark.	Platt, N. Y.
Bailey,	Dillingham,	Kittredge,	Scott,
Berry,	Dolliver,	McCumber,	Simmons,
Blackburn,	Dubois,	McEnery,	Stewart,
Burnham,	Fairbanks,	McLaurin, S. C.	Teller,
Burton,	Foster, La.	McMillan,	Tillman,
Carmack,	Frye,	Mallory,	Turner,
Clapp,	Gallinger,	Millard,	Vest,
Clark, Mont.	Hale,	Mitchell,	Warren.
Cockrell,	Harris,	Morgan,
Culberson,	Hawley,	Patterson,

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCCUMBER in the chair). Forty-six Senators have responded to the roll call. A quorum is present. The Senator from Kansas will proceed.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, it is just four hundred years since Columbus coasted along the Isthmus from Honduras to Porto Bello, seeking to solve the secret of the straits. Since that time and up to the present day there has been a steady and constant effort on the part of the principal nations of the world and on the part of a great many of the greatest men of the world to solve that same secret. There might be a great deal of inspiration derived from a consideration of the effort, the time, the money, and the labor that has been expended in an endeavor to accomplish this great work.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. HANNA], very properly, perhaps, tells us that it is not the time now to consider sentiment; that there is no necessity now for looking at anything but actual facts. I want to suggest, however, that in this remarkable period of four hundred years there is one fact that has at all times been prominent, one fact that stands out conspicuously and of such a character, I think, as to deserve the attention of even the veriest Gradgrind of the Senate, and that is, that in all of these explorations, in all of these surveys by scientific men of all sorts, there has never yet been placed upon record an adverse opinion concerning the feasibility and practicability of the Nicaragua route for a ship canal, the route which is embodied in the bill which has come over to us from the House of Representatives.

It is a startling thing, and an unusual thing, I think, that in an engineering work of great magnitude there should be absolutely no differences of opinion until very recently as to the feasibility and the practicability of it. It means a great deal, and I think we should derive some strength and support from that idea.

The Senator from Ohio the other day alluded in terms of high admiration to the great Frenchman, M. de Lesseps. I heartily agree with the Senator in his estimate of the value of the work and of the character of that great man.

The fact that, after the tremendous opposition of Great Britain and other powers, he finally succeeded in bringing to completion, successfully in every respect, the Suez Canal, that saved the voyage around the Cape of Good Hope, is a monument which will endure forever, and which will very largely, at least, cause the people of the world to forget the unfortunate errors and mistakes he subsequently made. The Senator from Ohio thinks that the Panama route is vastly strengthened because it had the support of this great man. I am glad that the Senator has summoned M. de Lesseps as a witness in this case. It is fortunate for us that he was at one time here and gave his evidence before a committee of the other House of Congress. On March 8, 1880, before the Special Committee on Interoceanic Canals, appointed by the House of Representatives, Count Ferdinand de Lesseps, the projector of the Panama Ship Canal, came before the committee at its request; and I read from the report the following:

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will remember that on Saturday last it conferred upon me the pleasant duty of inviting Count de Lesseps and Mr. Eads to appear before the committee to-day. They are both present. The committee will now have the pleasure of hearing Count de Lesseps.

Then the Count proceeded to give a description of his proposed plan of a ship canal across the Isthmus of Darien. It is not necessary to read more than a paragraph or two, which have reference to the Nicaragua route. Count de Lesseps says:

If it were determined to build a lock canal, and if there could not be a canal between the two oceans except a lock canal, then there was no doubt that the Nicaragua route was the best route.

He stated that the principal objection, or one of the objections, to the Nicaragua route was that it would be necessary first to construct a harbor at Brito, and another objection to it was that it would be impossible by that route to make a sea-level canal. He advocated the possibility of a sea-level canal, raised a company, and had funds subscribed for the purpose of building a sea-level canal.

It is fortunate, too, that we have the evidence of a great American engineer, Captain Eads, who appeared before the same committee on the same day; and, speaking of the Panama route, he made this statement:

Assuming, however, that the engineering difficulties involved in the drainage of the works during construction and those inseparable from the construction of a canal through the sickly bottom lands of the Chagres River, the damming off of its frightful floods, the creation of a new bed for its waters, and the deepening of the old one to constitute a part of the canal, can all be overcome by engineering skill, the question of expense still remains open and undecided, nor can it be fairly answered until the work has been completed. The cost of any work must always depend upon the number and character of the difficulties to be met and overcome, and the difficulties involved in the construction of a tide-level canal (only some of which I have mentioned) are of such a character that it is utterly impossible to fix with any degree of certainty the aggregate cost of the work. True, an estimate may be made, as, indeed, it has been by the engineers employed by M. de Lesseps. They have agreed upon the sum of $168,000,000 as the ultimate cost of the work, exclusive of interest during construction, but experience has shown that such estimates are quite unreliable and are always much below the actual cost.

Mr. President, it is known by everyone that, after the expenditure of $260,000,000, the French project was found to be absolutely impossible, and that it has been entirely abandoned.

I want to read here from another body of distinguished engineers, who were referred to by the Senator from Ohio:

THE NEW PANAMA CANAL COMPANY.

Report to the New Panama Canal Company by the International Commission of Engineers appointed in accordance with article 31 of the by-laws, dated November 16, 1898.

INTRODUCTION.

In accordance with article 31 of the by-laws, the New Panama Canal Company appointed a technical commission of engineers composed as follows:

Messrs. Robaglia, president, general inspector des ponts et chaussées (retired).
Bouvier, secretary, general inspector des ponts et chaussées (retired).
General Abbot, Engineer Corps, United States Army (retired).
Castel, inspector-general of mines (retired).
Daymard, chief engineer of Transatlantic Steamship Company.
Fargue, general inspector des ponts et chaussées (retired).
A. Fteley, chief engineer, Aqueduct Commission, New York.
Fulscher, private counselor to the department of public works of Prussia, formerly technical director of the Kiel Canal.
Hersent, civil engineer.
Hunter, chief engineer of the Manchester Canal Company.
Koch, counselor of public works, director of the Technical Academy of Darmstadt, formerly special member of the imperial commission of the Kiel Canal.
Jules Martin, general inspector des ponts et chaussées (retired).
Skalkowski, formerly director of the bureau of mines in the department of agriculture and estates, Russia.
Sosa, chief engineer of the Republic of Colombia.

That body of engineers comprised a number of distinguished engineers of different nationalities—English, German, American, French, and Italian. This commission of engineers made a report to the company, which reads as follows:

The commission of engineers has held between February 3, 1896, and September 8, 1898, ninety-seven regular sessions and many informal meetings. It has followed, as it were, day by day, the surveys, the works, and the plans of the company.

Several members visited the Isthmus in the spring of 1898. They brought back valuable data and information which confirmed in every important particular the conclusions to which the commission had already been led by its studies in Paris.

They then proceeded to discuss possible solutions in justification of the one adopted.

Principal problems to solve:

The building of a maritime canal across the Isthmus of Panama encounters, from a technical point of view, two main difficulties. These are, on the one hand, the chain of the Cordilleras, which must be crossed by a cut about 110 meters deep (361 feet) if a sea-level canal is contemplated, or by a very considerable cut, but little less than 70 meters deep (230 feet), if a canal with locks is intended. On the other hand, there is the river Chagres, a torrential stream, subject to sudden freshets, of which the canal must necessarily follow the valley for a great portion of its length and against which it must be protected by a proper regulation of the flow in order to insure the safety of navigation.

A third difficulty of a general nature presents itself when a canal with locks is considered: the question of water supply assumes, on account of the extent of the several needs to be provided for, an importance suggested by the fact that the accumulated flow of the Chagres itself and of the other streams on the line of the canal becomes insufficient during a certain portion of the year.

The first two difficulties increase as a lower and lower level of the canal is sought, and acquire their maximum of intensity in the case of a canal without locks.

On the contrary, the third difficulty, which appears only with a canal with locks, becomes greater as the summit level is raised.

The first difficulty, relative to the excavation of the great cut at the summit separating the two watersheds, does not raise any special technical question; it is simply the work to be done by manual labor, which may require more or less time and expenditure, but which, being without any inherent element of impossibility on account of the well-known character of the material, does not require any special study. It is the practical problem of a large excavation to be made within a restricted space.

PRINCIPAL DIFFICULTY ENCOUNTERED BY A CANAL WITHOUT LOCKS.

The second difficulty, due to the presence of the river Chagres upon the same territory as the canal, is, in view of possible consequences, of a more serious order. The rectification of the bed of the river for the purpose of utilizing it for the canal can not be contemplated. The irregularity of the flow and the violence of the large freshets are incompatible with a solution of that kind.

To turn the stream completely from its course and to direct it to the Pacific slope, far from the location selected for the canal, an idea formerly advanced and in part considered, would be a colossal undertaking, requiring an amount of labor which would render it impracticable. It is a solution upon which it does not seem possible to dwell. It therefore becomes necessary to make of the river and of the canal two neighbors, whose character and wants are to be harmonized. This is a solution which seems very difficult when considering a canal without locks. In fact, from whatever point of view it is considered we must acknowledge that it is necessary to prepare parallel to the canal an artificial waterway capable of discharging under occasional flood conditions a very large flow per second, and this even when the waters of a large portion of the watershed have been temporarily stored in a reservoir to be provided.

An artificial bed established at a higher elevation than the canal itself would prove to be not only a work very difficult to execute, but also to be a danger, a permanent menace, to the canal itself.

We can consequently state that the principal obstacle to the execution of a canal without locks results less from the difficulties entailed by the execution of the deep cut at the summit than from those which spring from the proximity of the Chagres in the region to be crossed before reaching that summit. It will not, perhaps, be too much to maintain that herein lies an obstacle insurmountable to a conception of that kind.

We therefore have the decision of the engineers selected by the Panama Canal Company itself as to the absolute impracticability of ever obtaining there a sea-level canal.

It has been suggested as one of the reasons why we should take the Panama route that at some time in the future it might be possible to convert it into a sea-level canal; that at some day we might succeed in paralleling the old canal with the new canal, which would carry the waters of the Chagres, and which would enable ships to pass without lockage from ocean to ocean. This has been abandoned absolutely by the men most interested in solving this problem. It has been pronounced impracticable by many others.

Our own Commission recently made a report, and while not saying it is absolutely impossible, they said that it would involve the expenditure of at least $250,000,000, and would require not less than twenty years, without giving us the slightest hope of ultimate success.

I think the evidence which was given before the committee by Mr. Lyman E. Cooley is of great importance in these matters. Every man in the West knows that Mr. Cooley, as an engineer in connection with canals and dams and waterways, has had a most wonderful and successful experience. He is regarded as a master in all that pertains to that class of engineering, and he gave a very succinct and concise statement of the question as to a sea-level canal at Panama. He said:

Mr. de Lesseps and his coadjutors endeavored to maintain before the public the original sea-level proposition. So they proposed to construct this canal in steps, and cut out a step at a time, and eventually reach a sea-level canal. There was no final plan as to how that should be done further than was covered in the contract with Eiffel for some steel locks.

Let me say in that connection that the United States undertook an investigation of this matter in President Grant's day by the appointment of a commission consisting of Daniel Ammen, Chief of the Bureau of Navigation; General Humphreys, Chief of Engineers, United States Army, and Carlisle Patterson, Chief of the Coast Survey; that these gentlemen reached a conclusion and published that conclusion in 1876, I think, declaring unanimously in favor of the Nicaragua route as the most practicable route.

That has stood as the judgment of the profession on that matter ever since, and it was advocated by our delegates at the conference at Paris, in 1879, I think, where we sent Mr. Menocal and Mr. Ammen and Mr. Johnson; that the English representatives and Russian representatives cooperated, and it was admitted generally that the Nicaragua route was the best route for a high-level canal; and the conference would have so decided, but as the matter progressed De Lesseps came before the conference with the proposition that this must be a sea-level canal, and on this condition the vote was for Panama, with a large number of the foreign delegates not voting. That is the history of the matter. That judgment stood on its merits as the judgment of American engineers until this last report.

Now, the Frenchmen never even claimed that their route was suitable for a high level canal in comparison with Nicaragua until as a later proposition it became necessary to save their bacon by building a lock canal. There were good reasons for the American people entertaining a preference for Nicaragua, because that is the unbroken decision on the matter as the results of all investigations.

The CHAIRMAN. For a great many years.

Mr. COOLEY. Ever since 1876. I personally can see no reason for changing that judgment now.

Mr. President, it is true that we have had a decision from our Commission; we have had three reports from the Commission; and I propose to take them up and to call attention to some points where I think, with all due respect to the Commission, conceding their ability in every way, we may yet venture to differ somewhat from their conclusions.

For fifty years our people have suffered under a nightmare of restraint brought about by diplomatic jugglery and unwarranted selfishness. About five years ago the American people had made up their minds that this was a work of too great magnitude to be intrusted to the hands of private individuals or corporations, and all over the country the sentiment was universal that the Government itself should undertake the construction and control of this world-wide necessity.

Fortunately, we have been enabled to remove the barrier to national action, and by the enactment of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty the hands of the Government are released for this mighty work. The nation was really ready to proceed with this work at that time, but there were powerful interests that feared the competition and interposed every possible obstacle for delay. There were others, of course, who were doubtful as to whether the necessary explorations had been made, and whether any unknown difficulties existed which had to be removed. The two influences combined held back action at a time when it seemed as if the work was about to be begun.

The Nicaragua Canal Commission was organized and authorized to make a thorough exploration of the route via the San Juan River and Lake Nicaragua. This route had been explored, surveyed, and resurveyed time and time again, and the extraordinary fact remains to this day that, notwithstanding the number of surveys and examinations that have been made of this route by governmental as well as corporate representatives, no engineer has ever yet placed upon record an opinion adverse to its feasibility and practicability. After a complete examination again the Nicaragua Canal Commission reported to us that there were no obstacles in the way; that the canal could be constructed within the limit of what was deemed a reasonable expenditure of money. This still was not sufficient, and again the same powerful influences were brought to bear, and the Isthmian Canal Commission was authorized and a million of dollars appropriated in order that it might not only reexamine the Nicaraguan route, but the Panama and all other possible routes.

Over two years of time were consumed by this Commission, and on November 30, 1900, a preliminary report was submitted which, while making estimates on a larger and deeper canal than had ever before been contemplated, still reported that there was absolutely nothing to prevent the construction of a practicable canal ample for all modern purposes along the Nicaraguan route. A year later their final report was submitted, which again repeated the undoubted fact that there was absolutely nothing along the line of the San Juan River, the lake, or the two divisions at the east and west end which offered anything that was unusually difficult or that might not be reasonably and easily overcome. At the same time certain differences were pointed out as to the Panama line.

It was fairly and fully examined, and although it was stated that there were certain physical advantages, such as a shorter canal line, a more complete knowledge of the country through which it passes, and a lower cost of maintenance and operation in favor of the Panama route, yet the price fixed by the Panama Canal Company for the sale of its property and franchises is so unreasonable that its acceptance could not be recommended by the Commission. It was stated in this report that, except for the items of risks and delays, the time required to pass through the canals need be taken into account only as an element in the time required by vessels to make their voyages between terminal ports.

Compared on this basis, the Nicaraguan route is the more advantageous for all transisthmian commerce except that originating or ending on the west coast of South America. For the commerce in which the United States is most interested, that between our Pacific and Atlantic ports, and European and American, the Nicaraguan route is shorter by about one day, and the same advantage exists between our Atlantic ports and the Orient. For our Gulf ports the advantage of the Nicaraguan route is two days.

The Nicaraguan route would be the more favorable one for sailing vessels because of the uncertain winds in the Bay of Panama. A canal by the Panama route will be simply a means of connection between the two oceans. While it has been a highway of commerce for more than three hundred years, and a railroad has been in operation there for nearly fifty years, this has effected industrial changes of but little consequence. The natural features of the country are such that no considerable development is likely to occur as a result of the construction and operation of the canal.

The cost of completing the two canals was given, and a statement was made of the value in completing the canal of the work done by the Panama Canal Company. After this report was made public there seemed to be a panic among the members of the Panama Canal Company, and in great haste a proposition was made finally offering the entire property at the valuation placed upon it by the Commission. Taking up this offer of the Panama Canal Company, the Commission, in January of this year, prepared a supplementary report in which some marked changes occur in the conclusions given as compared with the conclusions in the former report. A close examination will show that many items that were mentioned favorable to the Nicaraguan route are omitted, and that additional arguments in favor of the Panama route are inserted and additional emphasis given to certain advantages possessed by that route.

Now, Mr. President, while I have the highest regard, respect, and esteem for the members of this Commission, there are some extraordinary things, it seems to me, in the figures used by which they arrive at some of these conclusions. I desire very briefly to call the attention of the Senate to these matters. I can not help thinking that the open character of the country and the visibility of the work actually done unduly impressed our Commission, and that the idea of saving some money and getting a bargain was allowed too much to influence their judgment and obscure other matters of vital importance. In the preliminary report, which was made in November, 1900, the valuation of the work of the Panama Canal Company is as follows:

Canal excavation	$21,020,386
Gatuncillo diversion	1,125,000
Railroad diversion (4 miles)	300,000
	22,445,386
Contingencies, 20 per cent	4,489,077
	26,934,463
Panama Railroad stock at par	7,000,000
Aggregate	33,934,463

It was stated there that the value of the French work is greatly reduced by the fact that the spoil banks on the Atlantic maritime section frequently come within the limits of the enlarged canal now estimated for. It is the universal practice in determining the cost of work to be done to add a certain percentage for contingencies, because for safety it is always deemed better to provide a margin for the unforeseen difficulties which may have to be encountered or overcome.

In buying a piece of work to be utilized in a new or greater work the doubtful element is of a different sort. In that case the purchaser, in order to be safe, must necessarily count on certain contingencies that will prevent the application of the old work as fully and completely and with as much value as may be implied by the first estimate. Consequently it would be the part of wisdom and prudent business discretion to deduct a percentage for contingencies, all of which would have a tendency to reduce the value of the work to the purchaser. Instead of that, our Commission, for some reason which has not been satisfactorily explained, although the information was sought in the hearings before the committee, has added 20 per cent to this estimate. This estimate was materially changed in the final report, and the figures there appear as follows:

Canal excavation	$21,020,386
Chagres diversion	176,186
Gatun diversion	1,396,456
Railroad diversion (4 miles)	300,000
	22,895,028
Contingencies, 20 per cent	4,579,005
Aggregate	27,474,033

Of the existing 70,000 shares of the Panama Railroad—

The Commission say—the canal company will transfer to the United States all but about 1,100 shares.

They say:

These latter are held by a few individuals residing in various parts of the United States and in Europe. As it will not be the policy of the United States to so manage the railroad as to secure a large revenue, it is probable that the holders of these shares will in time find it to their interest to dispose of them at the price fixed by the Commission for the other shares.

So we become a stockholder in the Panama Railroad Company and trust to the future to secure the remainder. But the final estimate is as follows:

Excavation done	$27,474,033
Panama Railroad stock at par	6,886,300
Maps, drawings, and records	2,000,000
Total	36,360,333

That of course includes in it 20 per cent for contingencies which had been previously added, amounting to $4,579,000.

Then by an extraordinary process the Commission proceeds to add 10 per cent more to cover omissions. Three million six hundred and thirty-nine thousand six hundred and sixty-seven dollars is added to the total heretofore given, making a total of $40,000,000. As a matter of course, nearly half a million of the last 10 per cent is the proportionate part of the contingencies which were added to the other. So we pay a half million dollars for a percentage added upon a percentage, to say nothing of the peculiar valuation of the railroad property to which I shall now call attention.

I hope Senators have noticed the map which was laid upon their desks some time ago, giving the location of the Panama Railroad and the Panama Canal. By looking at that map it will be seen that, instead of its becoming a matter which will be of use to us, from opposite the thirteenth milepost on the canal to the thirty-ninth milepost the railroad is to be moved a considerable distance from its present location and is to be rebuilt, absolutely changed in every particular. All the old material, as everyone knows, in reconstructing the new road will be absolutely wasted.

Mr. MITCHELL. How long is that?

Mr. HARRIS. About 30 miles. It is an exceedingly crooked line. It is an exceedingly difficult line undoubtedly, because the original and favorable line is occupied by the present railroad, which will be in the future occupied by the canal. But by looking at the map Senators can see that it is exceedingly crooked, and I estimate that there will be certainly not less than 30 miles of new railroad to be constructed, and consequently that what we pay the Panama people will be a donation and absolutely thrown away.

Certainly, Mr. President, this seems a very remarkable and unusual way to estimate the value of property which is being purchased. It is clearly shown and stated by members of the Commission that the Panama authorities exhibited a complete schedule of properties, naming everything which could possibly be of value, and why there should be $3,632,403 added to cover omissions is inexplicable.

It seems also strange, Mr. President, that $2,000,000 should be allowed for maps, drawings, and records. It is almost impossible to see what value maps, drawings, and records of abandoned and useless plans of a smaller canal, and of a different class of work altogether, could possibly have to us in the completion on the new scale and plans contemplated by our Commission. The Government of the United States has spent several millions of dollars in making explorations, with maps, drawings, and records of various routes. It will undoubtedly have to prepare new maps, new drawings, and new records of any work which may be undertaken. We can not depend safely upon any of the old data, but must begin absolutely from the ground up with the new work.

In considering the railroad valuation I wish to call attention to some other remarkable inconsistencies, as it seems to me. The Nicaragua Canal Commission, after a thorough examination of that route, estimated the cost of a double-track railroad, ample for all purposes as an auxiliary in the canal construction, at $50,000 per mile. The Isthmian Canal Commission, apparently possessed with a superabundance of caution, estimated the same work precisely at $75,000 per mile. Certainly no railroad contractor in the country, and I know by actual conversation with many of them, would fail to say that this was an ample allowance and sufficient to provide for every possible contingency. In estimating the value, however, of the Panama Railroad the Commission nearly doubles this amount, and allows about $140,000 per mile.

Notwithstanding the fact which I have stated that 30 miles of it has to be absolutely abandoned and thrown away, we allow them $140,000 per mile for the entire line and then proceed to construct 30 miles of new railroad, which will cost us not less than $75,000 per mile, because that is the amount which we proposed to allow to the Panama people for the 4 miles of railroad diversion that they have accomplished. It seems to me, Mr. President, that such figures justify us in being somewhat chary of the estimated value placed upon the property.

Now, the fact that the Commission made two reports in favor of the Nicaraguan route, stating expressly that it is because of the unreasonable price asked by the Panama people, shows clearly to my mind that it was simply a financial consideration which they regarded principally; that when the Panama people asked $109,000,000 for their property our Commission regarded it as absolutely out of question, and recommended the Nicaraguan route as the most feasible and practicable. "Feasible" and "practicable," it seems to me, Mr. President, apply more particularly to physical conditions than they do to the financial question.

And yet the Commission seem to have finally brought it down to a consideration of the financial question. At some point between the $40,000,000, at which they value the Panama property, and the $109,000,000, which the Panama people place upon it themselves, there would be a point where our Commission would have said that it was an absolutely even thing. Consequently, if we can show that the valuation of the property which they have given to the French company is excessive, and that in other respects there are to be extraordinary and unusual increases in the estimates which have been made, even the financial question disappears and we come back to the original recommendation of the Commission that the Nicaragua route is the most feasible and practicable and the most desirable for this country to own and control.

There is another very important point in the report of the Commission that I think ought to be called to the attention of the Senate, and I think Senators ought to have it in mind in the consideration of this matter at all times.

In the final report of the Commission, Mr. President, it is stated that there is one important matter which can not enter into its determination (that is, the question between the two routes), but which may in the end control the action of the United States. Reference is made to the disposition of the Governments whose territory is necessary for the construction and operation of an isthmian canal. It must be assumed, says the Commission—mark the words, Mr. President—it must be assumed that Colombia will exercise the same fairness and liberality if the Panama route is determined upon that have been expected of Nicaragua and Costa Rica should the Nicaraguan route be preferred.

Since this report was made we have had the draft of the proposed treaties laid before us, one by the Nicaraguan Government and the other by the representatives of Colombia. It seems to me, when one considers these two treaties, that if the Commission based its recommendation upon the assumption of equal fairness and satisfactory arrangements to be made with the two Governments, certainly this assumption must be found to be absolutely without foundation. The convention proposed by Colombia, it seems to me, could never possibly be accepted as a basis upon which to expend this enormous amount of money, and to involve such tremendous interests. It is lacking in every element of fairness, and hardly seems to have a decent respect for the rights and wishes of this country.

Article III gives the use of the zone of territory along the route of the canal, about 6 miles in width, excluding the cities of Panama and Colon, and the use for canal purposes of certain islands in the Bay of Panama, together with 10 fathoms of water in the Bay of Limon, in extension of the canal; but the same "shall not be construed as being within the zone herein defined, nor governed by the special provisions applicable to the zone." Apparently this means simply the use of a portion of the bay, the rest of the bay and the town of Colon, heretofore stated to be almost entirely the property of the Panama Canal Company and the railroad company, absolutely outside of the control of this country.

What possible complications might ensue it is impossible to say. It is also provided that joint commissions shall be had to control sanitation and the police of the canal zone, and to establish and administer a joint civil and criminal jurisdiction as to contracts and crime, bringing into the management and control of the canal zone and the canal elements of friction and controversy that will be absolutely fatal. As is well said by the distinguished Senator from Alabama, "Nothing could come of such joint authority except unceasing controversy and strife."

Article V seems to imply that entirely separate ports for vessels shall be constructed and maintained at each entrance of the canal within the limits of the zone fixed by this convention, which expressly excludes the Bay of Limon and the greater part of the Bay of Panama. It also provides that the United States will suitably supply the towns of Panama and Colon with necessary aqueducts and drainage works in order to prevent their becoming centers of infection on account of their proximity to the canal. The Government of the United States is authorized to impose and collect equitable water rates, previously agreed upon with the Government of Colombia, during fifty years, for the service rendered; but on the expiration of said term the use of the water shall be free for the inhabitants of Panama and Colon.

Panama is a city of from 20,000 to 30,000 people, situated upon a rocky site, and has not a foot of sewer or water pipe in its limits. There is no suitable water supply to be had except at a very considerable distance. The same thing is true of the town of Colon, where probably water can be had only by extensive pumping works, while from its flat location adequate drainage will be a matter of very serious difficulty. What millions will be necessary to comply with this portion of the treaty we have no means of knowing.

Article VII provides that all damages caused to private land owners by inundation or by the deviation of water courses shall be paid by the United States after the same shall have been ascertained by the joint commission.

Article XXV, which provides for the payment to the Colombian

Government, is still more objectionable and leaves much to be determined in the future. It is as follows:

ARTICLE XXV.

As the price or compensation for the right to use the zone granted in this convention by Colombia to the United States for the construction of a canal, together with the proprietary right over the Panama Railroad, and for the annuity of $250,000, gold, which Colombia ceases to receive from the said railroad, as well as in compensation for other rights, privileges, and exemptions granted to the United States; and in consideration of the increase in the administrative expenses of the department of Panama consequent upon the construction of the said canal, the Government of the United States binds itself to pay Colombia the amount of $7,000,000 in American gold on the exchange of the ratification of this convention, after its approval by the legislative bodies by both countries, and fourteen years after the date aforesaid a fair and reasonable annuity that shall be agreed upon by the contracting Governments three years before the expiration of the above-mentioned term of fourteen years.

In fixing this fair and reasonable annuity there shall be taken into consideration the present price of the usufruct of the railway as well as the compensation that is to be stipulated for the use of the zone and for the additional administrative expenses that the construction of the canal will impose upon Colombia; and also the advanced payment of $7,000,000 and the comparative cost and conditions upon which the United States reasonably could have expected to acquire concessions satisfactory to it in respect of any other canal route.

Three years before the expiration of each term of one hundred years the annuity for the following term shall be fixed in a similar manner.

But in the event that the parties are unable to come to an understanding within the periods above referred to as to such fair and reasonable annuity, then before the second year prior to the termination of the periods above referred to the contracting parties shall proceed to constitute a high commission, to be composed of five members, of whom two shall be appointed by Colombia, two by the United States, and the fifth (who shall be the president of such high commission) shall be the president for the time being of the International Peace Tribunal of The Hague, and the determination reached by said commission, by a majority vote, concerning such fair and reasonable annuity that is to be paid to Colombia by the United States in conformity with this article shall be binding upon the contracting parties.

But no delay nor difference of opinion in fixing such amount shall affect nor interrupt the full operation and effect of this convention in all other respects

Article XXV provides, as the compensation to be paid Colombia by the United States, that the sum of $7,000,000 shall be paid on the exchange of the ratification of this convention, "after its approval by the legislative bodies of both countries," and fourteen years after that date a fair and reasonable annuity that shall be agreed upon by the contracting governments three years before the expiration of the above-mentioned term of fourteen years.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that the difficulties suggested so briefly are absolutely insuperable, and that the assumption on the part of the Isthmian Canal Commission that we would obtain the same fairness from the Government of Colombia that we have a right to expect from Costa Rica and Nicaragua absolutely falls to pieces. With Nicaragua we have a treaty which specifically provides for a definite amount. It gives us in perpetuity, on the payment of $6,000,000, the use of an adequate canal zone, 10 miles wide during the period of construction, and 6 miles wide after the canal shall have been completed.

There are no towns along the line of the route. It provides that we shall pay them a mere nominal sum of $25,000 a year as a recognition of their sovereign rights. That is in perpetuity. It does not leave anything for the future consideration of joint commissions. It does not leave anything to delay, which is so difficult to forecast in negotiating on matters involving enormous amounts with the people of the South American countries.

Unfortunately, Mr. President, Colombia is to-day in the throes of a revolution. Her Congress, I believe, has not been in session for several years. This is the reason given for the dispute as to the validity of the last extension of the Panama Canal concession, dated April 26, 1900. When at some indefinite time in the future a congress of Colombia meets to say again what view they will take with regard to the rights of the Panama Canal Company, is it not fair to assume that they will take the position that the rights of this company have been absolutely forfeited and that the only valid title to be had must be obtained from the Colombian Government and its Congress? Even if that question is not raised—tempted by the $40,000,000—then we have the question, at an indefinite time in the future, of the approval of the proposed convention.

In the meantime we are supposed to have paid the forty millions to the Panama Company, and no further action can be taken until, as stated in Article XXV, this convention has been approved by the legislative bodies of both countries. I can not imagine, Mr. President, that this convention will ever be approved by the Congress of the United States, to say nothing of the Congress of Colombia. This is but one of the many features of doubt and uncertainty involved in the diplomatic and legal difficulties surrounding the French company in every direction. I shall not allude to the possibilities growing out of the equities of the stock and bond holders of the old Panama Canal Company. Some of our ablest and best lawyers are positive in the opinion that we will ultimately be held responsible to these individuals who have suffered so tremendously. Other Senators will treat of these matters, and I shall pass on to the consideration of some of the physical features of the two propositions.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCCUMBER in the chair). Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HARRIS. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator seems to have given this matter great study. I confess that I have been so busy with other things here that I have given it very little. I should like to ask the Senator one question.

Mr. HARRIS. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. What is the status or what will be the condition on the Nicaragua route in regard to private lands? Does the concession from the Government there carry with it any right to enter upon private property and use it for this canal, or are we to be subjected to the claims of the private owners, who will have the conditions there favorable to mulct us indefinitely, or to rob us, so to speak, in getting a great amount of money for the use of the land on which to build the canal and excavate the earth? In other words, have not some Americans gone down there already, looking forward to this as the only route, and fixed up a whole lot of schemes by which the United States will have to pay millions and millions of dollars for the right of way? I just want to get at that view.

Mr. HARRIS. As I understand it, the treaty with Nicaragua provides for condemnation proceedings where private rights are involved.

Mr. TILLMAN. What court will take the matter in hand? The people of that country alone?

Mr. HARRIS. I will endeavor to find the clause which relates to that. Article V of the treaty with Nicaragua says:

When the canal district is established the Government of the United States will furnish the Government of Nicaragua with a map showing the limits thereof, as established by this convention; and thereupon the right of entry, occupation, possession, use, and control of all the lands and waters of Nicaragua comprised in such district shall be considered as granted by a lease in perpetuity to the United States for the purpose of the canal.

Areas of land and water so comprised that form part of the public domain of Nicaragua shall pass into the possession, use, and control of the United States without any cost or charges. If any areas of land or water so taken, or any right, title, estate, use, or interest therein are claimed at the date of this convention as the property, legal or equitable, of private persons or corporations, the United States may acquire such rights, titles, estates, use, or interests by purchase from the owners, or, failing in that, may proceed to condemn them as stated further on in this convention.

For the purpose of fixing the compensation to be paid by the United States in the condemnation proceedings contemplated in Articles III and V, a mixed commission of four jurists of repute, two to be appointed by each of the contracting parties, shall assess and award the damages to be paid by the United States. The procedure and regulations to be observed by said commission for the taking of evidence, and in the trial of cases to condemn and award damages, shall be in accordance with the laws of Nicaragua not in conflict with this convention. The damages awarded shall be compensatory only and fixed without reference to appreciation of values by the contemplated or actual construction of the canal.

In case of disagreement of the commission on the amount of damages to be awarded in any case, an umpire shall be appointed by the two Governments who shall render the decision, and in case the Governments do not agree in the appointment, this umpire shall be selected by lots from four candidates, two presented by each party. In the event of death, absence, or incapacity of any such commissioner or umpire, or of his omitting, declining, or ceasing to act, his place shall be filled by the appointment of another person in the manner above indicated.

All decisions by a majority of the commission or by the umpire shall be final.

Mr. TILLMAN. If I did not fail to catch it, I think there are words read by the Senator in regard to the date of this convention.

Mr. HARRIS. The date?

Mr. TILLMAN. Please go back to the sentence about lands owned by private parties at the date of this convention. What I am after is to find out whether the private property rights which are to be condemned or bought by us are those in existence when that treaty was made or whether there has been a chance for speculators to go in there since and fix up a job by which we are to get the property that belonged to the Nicaraguan Government at that time, but which has since passed out of its hands.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not see exactly what the Senator alludes to.

Mr. TILLMAN. It is along toward the beginning, something about the date of condemnatory proceedings.

Mr. HARRIS. The first two lines read:

When the canal district is established the Government of the United States will furnish the Government of Nicaragua with a map showing the limits thereof.

I presume that upon the filing of that map all the rights of the Government will accrue.

Mr. TILLMAN. I know; but it speaks there of private rights which will exist or which existed then in donating to us this public domain. What I am after is to find out if there is any public domain left or whether somebody has not already bought it to saddle on us the whole thing.

Mr. HARRIS. From all the information the committee has been able to get, the Government has very large and extensive possessions there. I understand that there has been some land acquired along the right of way on the western division, between the lake and Brito.

Mr. TILLMAN. Since that convention or before?

Mr. HARRIS. No; years ago.

Mr. TILLMAN. Everybody is willing, I presume, to pay for land which was owned bona fide away back yonder, but because we are going to build a canal we do not want this land to become valuable by reason of that fact so that we shall have to pay $50, $100, or $200 an acre for land that is not now worth 20 cents.

Mr. HARRIS. I presume there might be an interval between the passage of this act, for instance, and the filing of the map or the taking of the necessary steps when some such speculative proceedings might be possible. That would be the case anywhere and everywhere, and I do not know how they could be foreclosed or prevented.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator allow me to have his copy of the treaty? I will not interrupt him any further, and I will examine it myself.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Kansas if he is able to state how much approximately it would cost the Government for the right of way in addition to the $6,000,000 to which he has referred?

Mr. HARRIS. How much will have to be paid for private rights?

Mr. CULBERSON. Yes; that is the effect of the question.

Mr. HARRIS. I have not the information, Mr. President. I do not know that any estimate has ever been given. There are supposed to be some private rights on different portions of the line, but I have never seen any estimate made of them, nor do I know of any data which we have on that subject.

Mr. TILLMAN. This is a proposed treaty instead of an actual treaty, is it not? I had supposed that it was an agreement already entered into by which we were protected against private parties.

Mr. HARRIS. It is a proposed treaty.

Mr. TILLMAN. It seems the language is phrased exactly for the purpose I have just outlined, of having the whole right of way seized on by some private parties for speculative purposes in collusion with the present Government of Nicaragua, so that when we go down there nobody knows how many millions we will have to pay for it.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not think there is any question but that the 20 per cent contingency fund which is added to the estimate for the canal would be ample to cover any such case as the Senator suggests; but, as a matter of course, I do not know what the private interests might possibly amount to on either route.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will read to the Senator what I had allusion to a moment ago, supposing it was a treaty already in existence.

Areas of land and water so comprised that form part of the public domain of Nicaragua shall pass into the possession, use, and control of the United States without any cost or charges. If any areas of land or water so taken, or any right, title, estate, use, or interest therein are claimed at the date of this convention as the property, legal or equitable, of private persons or corporations, etc.

"If," at the time we sign this, these titles or these claims to these lands are made or set up. You see the wide door we open for persons to wait here until it is apparent that the Nicaragua route is going to be selected, and immediately the telegraph will be set in motion and the claims will assume shape and form before this treaty is signed, if they do not already exist, and we will be laying a foundation in this very treaty for an enormous steal, I would call it, by which the Government of the United States will be mulcted in millions to get the right of way.

Mr. HARRIS. I will simply say that this is a proposed treaty or convention. The bill we are now considering provides practically that the President shall sign it as soon as he is authorized by the passage of the bill. Now, the moment the bill passes the President will be authorized to have it signed and executed. The time will be very short between the passage of the bill and the execution of this treaty; whereas in the case of the convention with Colombia it has to be submitted for the legislative approval of the Congress of Colombia. I think that is a very marked difference between the two measures.

Mr. TILLMAN. I hope the Senator will understand me as not combating his apparent contention that the Nicaragua route is the best, because I am absolutely ignorant of the whole subject except the general information I have obtained through the newspapers, and I am trying to get light. I imagine that if we get either of these routes passed through Congress and the canal ordered we may reasonably expect that there will be an effort made by somebody to reach in and be benefited; that private parties or corporations will seize on such opportunities as will present themselves to bring in claims for damages on the right of way, or something which will undoubtedly take millions out of the Treasury of the United States. I am only trying to get at, first, the best route, the most practicable and feasible one to maintain after it is built; secondly, the cheapest route; and, lastly, the one that will have the least jobbery in it.

Mr. HARRIS. I agree with the Senator exactly, but I think the Senator will admit that in no case of a contemplated work is it possible to absolutely prevent or foreclose some of the possibilities which he suggests. There must be an interval of time between the formation and the execution of the necessary treaties and conventions, so that it is impossible to preclude and prevent any such action by private parties. I think this treaty has all the elements in it of fairness, and if it is promptly ratified, as it must be, by the executive officers of the two Governments, there is no reason to apprehend any wide door for any of the entering in and plundering the Senator indicates.

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator will allow me, I should like to remind him that this treaty, if signed at all, will relate back to December, 1900, to an agreement made between Nicaragua and the United States, and between Costa Rica and the United States, on the same terms, which will be ratified if this bill is passed, and that agreement would necessarily prohibit either Costa Rica or Nicaragua from making any disposal of property to private rights whatever. So the case is perfectly secure against any such opportunity.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator from Kansas will allow me, do I understand the Senator from Alabama to inform the Senate that the alienation by the Nicaraguan Government of its public domain (and that is the only question I am concerned in here) could not be made subsequent to December, 1900?

Mr. MORGAN. It could not.

Mr. TILLMAN. And therefore we are guarded, as far as we can be guarded, against any jobbery on the part of anyone in Nicaragua who might be connected with the Government alienating the public domain which existed at the time you speak of, December, 1900?

Mr. MORGAN. It is absolutely guarded, without any equivocation or doubt.

Mr. TILLMAN. It is in a little better shape than I had hoped.

Mr. HARRIS. There was a protocol executed at that time which certainly, it seems to me, might be fairly construed to bind the Nicaraguan Government.

Mr. President, it seems to me that in the consideration of the physical features of this question the first in importance of all considerations is certainty of success. Not only after tiresome extensions of time and enormous increased expense, with possibly shocking and exasperating loss of life, but success in a reasonable time, with expenses bearing some reasonable proportion to the estimate, and with considerations of humanity in the matter of life and health.

Second in importance is the shortening of distance in the total voyage. Desirable as it may be to have as short as possible the line between the two oceans, the primary object of the project is the shortening of distance between ports, and it must not be omitted or lightly considered in the choice of routes. A little more in the cost of operation or construction even is easily overbalanced in the profit in the saving of time to each vessel. I desire here to call attention to what is said by some of the able and thoroughly competent men who testified before the committee.

Mr. Haupt, an engineer of eminence and great success, one of the Commission, testifying before the committee in regard to this matter, makes the following statement.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. On what page?

Mr. HARRIS. On page 518, part 2.

Mr. HAUPT. Yes. As the question before this committee is largely one of the selection of two routes, I beg leave to say that while conceding to the wishes of the majority and signing a report in order to make it unanimous, and so, if possible, to secure legislation at this session, I still feel, and did then, that there were certain economic, physical, engineering, sanitary, and commercial advantages inherent to the Nicaragua route which gave it a decided preference over the Panama route.

In this, of course, I do not consider the cost of the concessions nor especially the cost of constructing the canal, but I think the others are of so preponderating weight as to overbalance any differences in the latter two items. The economic advantage is, a priori, the most important factor in the operation and utility of an interoceanic waterway, and that is briefly summed up in the report of the Commission by the statement that the Nicaragua Canal possesses an advantage between home ports of one day for all northbound commerce—that is, whether it be of European or American origin, or whether it has its destination in the Orient or North Pacific ports—and for all Gulf ports it would save about two days.

I have made an estimate of that saving based upon the average cost of moving vessels of about 3,000 tons capacity, which I have figured at about $250 a day. Some of these vessels have cost as high as $1,000 a day to operate and maintain, and some of them as low as $100 a day, but taking it at that average and estimating on a basis of 10,000,000 tons, of which, say, 75 per cent is north bound, the economy on that basis would amount to about $650,000 a year on steam alone. But as a large percentage would be carried by sail if this route be opened, the economy would probably be 50 per cent more, or about $1,000,000.

On page 520 he states:

Mr. HAUPT. Certainly, between the two termini, that is the measure of the advantage and utility of the canal. It does not make any difference whether one is very much shorter from sea to sea or not, and on that point, speaking from the physical standpoint, I would say that the Panama route, for the bulk of the commerce, at least 75 per cent of it being north bound and between northern termini, that the Panama route is directly away from the path of commerce or nearly at right angles to it, running from northwest to southeast, going south, so that every mile of that canal is a detour from the direct line of traffic, and that is a violation of a sound engineering and economic principle, while every mile on the Nicaragua route is in the line of or as near the line of traffic as it is possible to place it, so that the difference in the length of the route which is urged as an objection to the Nicaragua route is in reality no objection whatever.

Mr. TILLMAN. I do not want to interrupt the Senator unduly, but if he is not pursuing any regular order I should like to make an inquiry of him.

Mr. HARRIS. I should like to proceed on this point, and then I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. TILLMAN. All right.

Mr. HARRIS. The committee also had a letter from Mr. Edward P. North, a civil engineer of very great experience, with regard to this question of economy. On page 26 of Senate Document No. 303 he makes a statement as to the saving in distance by the Nicaragua Canal owing to its greater proximity to all Northern ports:

And to-day any doubts that an isthmian canal, if of sufficient capacity, will at the end of twenty years from its completion carry as much domestic traffic as the Soo, or say 30,000,000 tons of freight, or that the development on our Pacific coast will not be greater at the end of that period than the development of the country served by the traffic on the Great Lakes has been in the last twenty years, does not seem to have over 1 per cent of probability to back it.

Considering the two routes proposed—Nicaragua and Panama—it will be immediately seen that while the Nicaragua route is better for both the Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific coasts, the Panama route discriminates against the Gulf coast. This is unfortunate for the whole country, as the productive industries are less developed in the Mississippi Valley than along and near the Atlantic coast, and it is desirable that there should be a substantially equal development in all parts of our country. The disadvantages of a high cost of transportation, whether due to greater distances or an artificial cause, are equal, but a relative disadvantage arising from distances can not be overcome; that is persistent.

Referring again to the testimony given before you, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 6, the distances in miles are as follows:

	New York.	New Orleans.
To San Francisco via—
Nicaragua	4,922	4,119
Panama	5,299	4,689
To Shanghai, via Honolulu, via—
Nicaragua	10,752	9,949
Panama	11,007	10,406

Taking, as above, the sea freights at one-half mill per ton mile, we will have for freight charges:

	Via Nicaragua.	Via Panama.	Saving in freight charges via Nicaragua.
			Cents.
San Francisco to New York	$2.46	$2.65	19
San Francisco to New Orleans	2.03	2.35	28
Shanghai to New York	5.38	5.50	12
Shanghai to New Orleans	4.97	5.20	23

I assume that, as the center of population is now about as near the Gulf as to the Atlantic, the domestic freightage to and from the Gulf ports will equal that to and from the Atlantic ports, and that the same will be true as to freights with the Pacific islands, China, etc. Also, from the increased wealth due to lower tolls and freight charges, the traffic of these regions will at least double in the next twenty years, giving our isthmian canal 8,000,000 tons between our eastern and the Pacific islands and foreign ports, without reference to any diminution or increase of the Suez traffic.

On this basis, allowing 30,000,000 tons domestic, one-half to New York and one-half to New Orleans, and 8,000,000 foreign freight, divided as above, you will see that the commerce and industries of the Atlantic and Gulf ports, taking New York and New Orleans as typical of both, would be handicapped by the adoption of the Panama route, as follows:

New York:
15,000,000 tons domestic, at 19 cents	$2,840,000
4,000,000 tons foreign, at 12 cents	480,000
		$3,320,000
New Orleans:
15,000,000 tons domestic, at 29 cents	4,350,000
4,000,000 tons foreign, at 25 cents	920,000
		5,270,000
Total handicap per annum		8,590,000

The discrimination against the Mississippi Valley by the Panama route is more than one-half greater than against New York.

In addition to this the adoption of the Panama route would call for an extra freight charge of 37 cents against all commerce passing between our Pacific coast and Europe, San Francisco and Liverpool being taken as type ports, and all of these discriminations must reduce the profits of production and consumption on the Pacific coast.

On the other hand, taking Guayaquil as the type of the trade of western South America, the Panama route would give New York an advantage of 19 and New Orleans 9 cents per ton over the Nicaragua route. But British Columbian ports will probably give the proposed canal more traffic than that part of the west coast of South America which does not find its market by the Magellan Strait. The country tributary to the Pacific is narrow and arid, without resources capable of large development. The natural outlet of the rich mineral regions in the Andes is down the Amazon, and this outlet will be developed with increasing wealth.

These strictly commercial considerations probably justify the United States in building the Nicaragua Canal if the Panama Canal could be completed and given to this country.

Now I will hear the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. TILLMAN. I note that Article XI of this proposed treaty between the United States and Nicaragua has a queer provision, which I will read to the Senator:

ARTICLE XI.

Although maintaining that upon principles of justice no valid claims of citizens of the United States exist against Nicaragua, the latter accepts the engagement of the United States to pay and to discharge Nicaragua from all liability on account of claims of citizens of the United States which may have arisen prior to the date of the signing of this convention.

In other words, Nicaragua notifies us that she is perfectly willing to let us pay any claims of our own people that we see fit. She denies that there are any just claims, but still she graciously permits us to settle with our own people if we see proper. Can the Senator explain that?

Mr. HARRIS. I think that is a perfectly natural position for Nicaragua to take.

Mr. TILLMAN. Why should citizens of the United States have any claims there at all, unless they are speculative claims obtained for the very purpose I have just mentioned, of having this Government pay an immense sum of money for something that has no value, unless this Congress enacts this legislation? In other words, why should any Americans have gone to Nicaragua and obtained of the Nicaragua Government title or claims to certain lands unless for the purpose of having the United States make those claims valuable?

Mr. HARRIS. No, Mr. President, it is not necessary to assume that. It is a fact perfectly well known to all Senators that a corporation organized in this country, called the Maritime Canal Company, did expend a considerable amount of money in Nicaragua, and did go down there and make an effort to build a canal, and failed. The Nicaraguan Government has declared that all their rights and concessions are forfeited. That company may possibly have some private rights; they may possibly own some land; they may possibly own some buildings. Nicaragua by that provision of the treaty practically says to us that we shall settle with those people for whatever we consider necessary to take in the construction of the canal. That seems to me to be a most natural position. The Maritime Canal Company has time and again through their president and through their representatives told Congress, through its committee, that they did not desire to interpose any obstacle or any objection; that they did not desire to set up any claim.

A great deal has been said about—and I believe the minority report of the Interoceanic Canal Committee lays a great deal of stress upon it—probable claims that may be brought forward by the Maritime Canal Company.

Mr. MITCHELL. The officers of that company have disclaimed any intention of doing any such thing.

Mr. HARRIS. The officers of that company have time and again disclaimed any such intention. It is possible, however, that the officers of the company may not be able forever to control all the interests of the company. Nicaragua simply says that that is a proposition that we must settle with our own citizens.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I do not think that any one of us need be very much concerned about the claims of the Maritime Canal Company. Those are vested claims or rights, whatever they may be, that we, in justice and in honor, must dispose of upon any equitable basis that may be determined by disinterested parties. I am concerned, however, about the probability, and almost the certainty, of some scheme of alienation of the public domain, by which parties who are speculating in this thing, will go there, or have already gone there, and have gotten such a title, or putative title, that as soon as this bill, if we shall adopt the Nicaragua route, passes and becomes a law these claimants will materialize and spring up in our pathway, with their hands reached out, so to speak, toward the Treasury, saying, "Stand and deliver." That is what I am speaking about. I am not concerned about the Maritime Canal Company at all.

Mr. HARRIS. The treaties and protocols which were made last year with Costa Rica and Nicaragua are within the Senator's reach. I do not know that I can say anything which will prevent him from having some fears of possible jobbery of that kind. This question has to be treated, I think, guarding it in every possible way against everything of that kind. I am not addressing myself particularly now, except in the way of a general comparison or contrast of the convention with Colombia and that with Nicaragua.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator will pardon me—I do not want to interrupt him too much—I have here House of Representatives Document No. 611, containing a communication from the Secretary of State to the Colombian minister. There is some language in it which puts a rather new phase on the question of this proposed treaty of ours. I will read it to the Senator:

I have not yet received a definite proposition from the Government of Costa Rica, but am informed by the Costa Rican minister that his Government is ready to enter into satisfactory arrangement with that of the United States on the basis of the protocol of December 1, 1900; but that, as set forth in the recent message of President Iglesias, an extract from which I inclose,

it will be necessary that the Government of Costa Rica should, before entering into positive negotiations with that of the United States of America, adopt a constitutional amendment authorizing the necessary concessions for the construction of an interoceanic canal, or to have the matter referred to public opinion in some other way by calling a constituent assembly for the purpose. I am assured by the Costa Rican Government that these steps will be taken as soon as the Congress of the United States shall decide the question of the route of the canal.

In other words, it would appear that our foundation for commencing this work is a little questionable as to whether everything has gone on in an entirely satisfactory manner. We have not got the negotiations with Costa Rica in such shape that we can go forward treading on firm ground; but we are subjected to a possibility, or a necessity on the first hand, of a constitutional amendment or some other reference to the people of Costa Rica by a vote before they can give us this concession.

Therefore, if we pass this bill and authorize the construction of this canal upon this route, we will then be subject to the whims or the greed or whatever other motive might influence the Costa Rican Government or the Costa Rican people in dealing with us. In other words, we can not get an absolute and clean title or concession that would leave us to go forward without the very danger I have spoken of from Nicaragua.

Mr. HARRIS. Does the Senator ask me to explain that?

Mr. TILLMAN. I do not want the Senator to explain it unless he sees fit to do so. I am only making known my own doubts and ignorance; that is all.

Mr. HARRIS. I will simply say, Mr. President, that the statement which we have from the Costa Rican authorities is that for a perfect completion of this matter it will require some further action on the part of the people of that country. They have pledged themselves, as I understand it, and as indicated there, to do that. President Iglesias was here a few years ago, and assured us that his people were willing and anxious to do everything they possibly could.

It may be said in regard to the attitude of Costa Rica that she has a comparatively small interest in this matter; that her territory simply touches for a few miles on the line of the canal. We touch the San Juan River at a point some 3 or 4 miles above the mouth of the San Carlos. The Costa Rican territory abuts upon the San Juan River up to within 3 miles of the lake. There it leaves the river and skirts around the southern end of Lake Nicaragua. So the rights we have to obtain from Costa Rica are comparatively small, though, of course, necessary; but every assurance has been made that there will be no difficulty in that direction.

Now, Mr. President, I want to read what Mr. Lyman E. Cooley has said with regard to the question of saving in transportation rates. Here is a letter written by Mr. Cooley, dated March 21, 1902, in response to a letter from the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN]:

DEAR SENATOR: I have given your inquiry of the 16th instant such attention as I could, and inclose herewith an approximate estimate of the cost of operating a steamship of 5,000 tons, net register, with a speed of 10 knots, on a sea route of 4,800 sea miles, and the saving to be effected by shortening the route by 600 miles. I have added some other comparisons and supplemented the same by some data from actual practice.

You will note that the saving is estimated at between 28 and 32 cents per cargo ton, or at between 33⅓ and 38 cents per registered ton.

You will also note that for all lengths of route and classes of ship the saving is estimated at 20 to 30 cents per cargo ton and a probable average of 25 cents, or 24 to 36 cents per registered ton and a probable average of 30 cents. This is 30 per cent of canal tolls taken at $1 per registered ton.

You will note further that the data of actual practice is in harmony with the steamship performance as made up in detail.

I call attention to my testimony before your committee on February 24, pages 37, 38. The rate is there given at one-third mill on long routes and the saving in distance as equivalent to 500 miles, in round numbers. This rate is to be regarded as a minimum rather than an average. The saving in length of route as given by the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey is 624 miles by Nicaragua over Panama. I also stated that the Nicaragua route treated as a high-level proposition need not involve over two hours more of lost time or detention than Panama. (See pp. 13, 36-37 of testimony.) So a saving of 600 miles can be practically realized by the best treatment of the Nicaragua route for all boats using the Yucatan Passage in the North Pacific trade.

The third consideration in importance, Mr. President, it seems to me, is that all kinds and classes of vessels must find it an attractive and advantageous route. Gentlemen who, for various reasons, have been connected with steamships are very positive in asserting that the day of the sailing vessel has entirely disappeared. This, it seems to me, can not be assumed to be true. While undoubtedly there has been a vast advance in the building of steamships, still, as the cheapest class of transportation known, sailing vessels will continue for many years to do a large share of our coasting trade; and also, with certain classes of freight, a large of the part of our foreign trade as well as of the rest of the world. It is conceded that so far as the Panama plan is concerned it is absolutely prohibitory and excludes all classes of sailing vessels.

I have here, Mr. President, from the Hydrographic Office a chart showing the route and distance to be sailed by sailing vessels both from Brito and Panama for all north point traffic. In going to San Francisco vessels have to sail far to the southwest from Panama through the variable and light airs of the region of the doldrums, south of the equator, making the distance, from January to May, 5,390 miles; from June to December, 5,000 miles. In coming from San Francisco to Panama, from June to November, the distance is 4,630 miles, and from December to May, 3,460 miles; whereas the distance to be sailed to Brito from San Francisco, from December to May, is 2,860 miles, and from January to June, 2,940 miles, while going to San Francisco at all seasons the distance is 4,120 miles.

I desire to insert as a part of my remarks an extract from the Shipping Industry of the United States, prepared by O. P. Austin, Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, without reading.

The extract referred to is as follows:

REVIVAL OF THE SAILING SHIP.

It is by no means certain that the bulk of the heavier freight of the future will not be carried in sailing ships. As the great centers of industry become more definitely localized and the visible supplies of the materials of industry and the quantities for consumption, such as cereals and provisions, can be more definitely ascertained in advance, it is quite possible that we will be more ready to substitute the less expensive and slower method of sail power for the mose expensive but quicker method of steam propulsion, especially in the case of lumber, grain, provisions, cotton, and mineral oils.

All that is needed is the development of the facilities for the maintenance of a visible supply of these commodities in quantities sufficient to last a few months and to keep ahead of the rate of consumption to that extent—a thing that could be done without any extra cost to the consumer and without any apparent disadvantage to the producer or distributor. In fact, the reduction in the cost of distribution by the substitution of sail for steam would inure to the advantage of both producer and consumer.

The building of sailing ships has never been prosecuted with more success than in the United States. Our "clippers," prior to the civil war, caused the British no little uneasiness. The marine world bought hundreds of our sailing craft year by year, such was the prestige of the American sailing ship prior to 1860. The revival of faith in the sailing ship in the United States, especially in New England, is a promising sign of the beginning of a new era in this part of our constructive history. The large schooner seems to be the coming type of this form of craft. Many of them have been constructed in recent years, and their progress in number and size is proof of their commercial suitability.

The George W. Wells, a vessel built of wood and launched at Bean's shipyard at Camden, Me., last August, is 345 feet long on top, 48 feet 6 inches clear beam, and 23 feet deep. Her 6 masts are of Oregon pine, 119 feet long, and carry 12,000 square yards of the heavier sail. The materials of construction included 550 tons of white oak lumber, 1,000,000 feet of hard pine, about 100,000 feet of white-pine deck plank, and several hundred tons of iron and copper bolts. Not only does the Wells carry the cargo of a steam-propelled vessel of large dimensions, but she also transports it from port to port with a speed that would be a credit to many a steamship now trading on the Atlantic.

Take her maiden passage from Philadelphia to Habana as an instance. Laden with the largest cargo of coal ever taken into the Cuban capital, she sailed from the Pennsylvania city on the 14th of November, and, allowing a day for the clearing of the Breakwater, headed south, reaching her destination on the 21st, practically making the ocean voyage in the remarkable time of six days, a distance in excess of a thousand miles. Returning from Habana, the Wells touched at Brunswick and took aboard a cargo of 460,000 yellow-pine railroad ties for the Erie railroad. Thus laden, she once more set sail and headed for New York. When she arrived off Sandy Hook she had consumed three days and twenty-four hours in making the run from port to port.

When it is remembered that a coastwise steamship consumes generally three days in making the passage, the splendid sailing qualities of the big schooner can be appreciated.

At Bath a similar six-masted schooner was launched in October, 1900. One of the largest steel sailing ships ever built in the United States was the Edward Sewell, launched in October, 1899. It was a double-deck ship of 355 feet in length, a beam of 45 feet, 28 feet in depth, and with a 23-foot draft.

The tenacity with which the demands for sailing vessels has been maintained is illustrated by the following table. Recently the older practice of towing barges on lakes and in coastwise trade has lost some ground in favor of the sailing ship that can take care of itself in bad weather.

It is possible, too, that the sailing vessel will be the feature of the merchant marine of the smaller nations as compared with the great national powers. The powers have to have speed in their warships to police the ocean and to guard their coasts. For that reason, among others, the steamship's rate of speed will be pushed to the limit of economical operation determined by the cost of fuel consumed, by the weight of fuel and machinery, and by space occupied by them.

This line of development will be worked out in the construction of the express type of passenger ships. Modern travel will follow this trend of construction, which insists on speed as the test of superiority in navigation. This is the direction the business of shipbuilding has been given in the German policy, where the naval and the mercantile developments are completely complemental parts of the same policy—the attainment of a first rank as a maritime power.

The other line of development, in which the militant or naval is subordinated to that of commercial policy, is illustrated in the case of Denmark. The mercantile marine of Denmark is comprised of 3,844 vessels of over 4 tons register, aggregating 423,549 registered tons. Of this total 3,305 were sailing vessels, measuring 165,308 tons, and 539 steamers of 258,241 tons. Even the larger nations have a considerable proportion of sailing tonnage to-day.

[a] For 1898, from Progress of British Shipping for 1899.

A comparison of sail tonnage with total tonnage shows that Austria-Hungary has a sail tonnage amounting to 21 per cent of the total, Holland 29 per cent, Germany 36 per cent, Norway 72 per cent, Italy 67 per cent, France 47 per cent, the United Kingdom 26 per cent, and Russia 45 per cent.

Mr. HARRIS. I also wish to refer to the testimony of Mr. Harvey, who is a distinguished engineer, who has had great experience in this matter of canal traffic. I wish to say that Mr. Harvey's engineering experience is as follows:

My engineering connection with the national canal around the Falls of St. Marys River, at the outlet of Lake Superior, dates from its earliest utilization as a State public work in 1855.

He gives on pages 13 and 14 of Senate Document No. 303 some interesting comparisons respecting these two routes in regard to sailing ships. I will ask leave of the Senate to insert them without reading in order to save time.

The extract referred to is as follows:

GEOGRAPHICAL POSITION AND CONDITIONS.

The United States occupies a cross section of the continent of North America, facing eastward on the Atlantic Ocean for 3,000 and westward on the Pacific for 1,500 miles and, including the Territory of Alaska, an additional coast line on the Pacific and Arctic of 3,500 miles, or 7,000 miles in all.

The national interest evidently lies in shortening the distance to be traversed from one of these coast lines to the other as much as possible, and which the isthmian canal will reduce by over 10,000 miles. The "N" route lies nearest the same by about 500 miles of sailing distance, so that a round trip involves a saving of 1,000 miles over the "P" route, which means ninety hours', or nearly four days', extra time for the average freight steamers and double that for the average sailing vessels. It has been claimed that this is partly counterbalanced by a shorter time of transit through the "P" canal, but this may be reasonably doubted.

No account is taken in such comparison of the distance to be traversed in the Bay of Panama of 120 miles on the west, or in Colon Bay of about 10 miles on the east, to reach an equal offing from the main coast lines for laying northerly sailing courses. By adding these the "P" route, east and west, is a few miles longer than that of "N," and by the testimony of Commander Young before your committee it appears that both Panama and Colon bays have tortuous channels which require daylight and freedom from fogs to navigate safely. As the section of minimum canal width is about the same in both routes, and the remainder of the "N" route, having the enlarged areas of Nicaragua Lake, and its artificial elongation, will permit of full speed by steamers, and its additional elevation above sea level to be overcome by lockage being less than 20 feet, the alleged saving of transit time on the "P" route practically disappears, and a parity in that respect can be safely assumed for both.

The geographical position of the "P" route, being in the area or zone of calms or doldrums (as stated by several of the witnesses before your committee), practically lays an effective embargo against sailing craft being benefited by it, while the prevalence of reliable trade winds, or air currents, on the "N" route offers special advantages to sail propulsion.

These facts are brought out so positively in the documentary evidence published by your committee that I need not enlarge upon them, but when coupled with the statement that of the entire marine tonnage of the United States, aggregating by latest returns 2,095,000 tons, 1,285,000, or over 60 per cent, is sailing craft, the same becomes most momentous. Norway and Sweden have 1,144,000 tons of sail craft to 626,000 of steam, or over 70 per cent.

To rule out such proportions of the national and world's marine would seem a clearly preposterous proposition. To minimize the effect of these considerations it has been asserted that the use of sail craft is on a decline, which portends the almost universal use of steam marine power. But here again facts are against this theory. Improvements are taking place in the construction of sailing vessels which may place them in the lead as the most economical marine freighters. The old-style square-rigged ships are being supplanted by multiple-masted schooner-rigged vessels of larger dimensions than ever before employed. Thus seven-masted schooners of 3,000 and 4,000 tons burden are being built in the State of Maine shipyards, fitted with auxiliary steam engines, effecting a saving of nearly 75 per cent in the number of requisite sailing crew which a square-rigged ship of the same capacity would require.

The sending of sailors aloft to "take in sail" in a gale of wind is nearly obsolete. The sails of a modern sailing vessel are now handled by power "winches" from the deck—a veritable revolution in marine industry, the far-reaching results of which students in such matters will appreciate as radically important in deciding as to the isthmian canal routes, which in one case prohibits and in the other favors the same.

It is well known that the building of sail craft has taken a new start in Germany, where one of some 5,000 tons burden has recently been added to the merchant marine, and that France is offering a bounty to vessels of that kind. This may be the result of farseeing statesmanship, in view of the economizing of coal consumption, which is fast becoming one of the great industrial problems of this century.

I will incidentally mention that when recently at the great fishery port of Gloucester, Mass., said to lead the world in that industry, I found that the best paying craft were schooner rigged, with an auxiliary screw operated by gasoline fuel. When sailing, the screw was uncoupled on the shaft, and, turning with the motion of the vessel, offered little resistance; but in calms or adverse winds was coupled, the fuel gas applied, and the vessel could be headed for a given point with a certainty of reaching it, which, in capturing schools of fish with "purse nets," was an invaluable feature.

This instance will serve to illustrate the conclusion that in all great canal plans and routes sailing craft interests with possible future increased developments should be provided for.

That this condition can be fulfilled on the "N" route alone is a fact conclusively proven by the evidence before your committee, and in my view of the case is one the importance of which can hardly be overestimated.

Mr. HARRIS. A fourth consideration of great importance, as indicated by the Commission itself, is the character and extent and resources of the country that will be developed.

Aside from the main points involved in this question, as to the practicability of construction, the cost, the commercial advantages, etc., one of the most important details to be considered is as to the nature of the country through which the canal would be constructed, its resources, products, and future prospects. It is manifest that a canal constructed through a desert, as at Suez, or across a barren mountain ridge, would not be as advantageous to its owners and constructors as a canal through a fertile country, productive of valuable agricultural and mineral sources of wealth.

All the testimony that has been gathered in regard to this branch of the subject agrees that the Nicaraguan route would prove remarkably advantageous in this respect. Before the hearings of the canal committees of the Senate and House began everyone knew, from the perusal of official statistics, that the Republics of Nicaragua and Costa Rica were productive of many important and valuable commodities and naturally capable of becoming very much more productive under proper cultivation and favorable circumstances for development. Abundant testimony at the various committee hearings has fully confirmed these previous opinions and has made it evident that a canal constructed along the proposed Nicaraguan route would at once and naturally become the outlet for very large quantities of agricultural and forest products, most of which would naturally tend to the American markets and have a stimulating and broadening influence upon our trade and commerce.

It is quite evident also from the testimony that the climate of the regions along the proposed route is extremely fine and of such a nature as to attract citizens of this country and enable them to live there at all seasons of the year in perfect comfort and health and to assist in the development of the natural resources with which Nicaragua and Costa Rica have been so lavishly endowed. The American and English engineers who have passed many months in active outdoor work in those regions unite in declaring that the country along the route of the proposed canal is most agreeable and healthful and the climate far more salubrious than that of most tropical countries; that the temperature is moderate and even, at all times of the day and all the year round, and that the nights are always cool, even in midsummer.

In regard to the products of the region, it is shown beyond question that Nicaragua is capable of becoming one of the greatest coffee-producing countries in the world; that its coffee is the equal of the best coffee produced anywhere, and is so regarded in the European markets. It is recorded that last year a certain variety of coffee grown in Nicaragua brought the highest price paid in London for any coffee. This coffee, by the way, it should be noticed, was grown by a colony of United States citizens consisting of about 80 families who had settled there and engaged in the coffee business. The Nicaragua coffee is little known in this country, but with the opening of the canal it would doubtless become an important item in our imports.

Other principal productions of Nicaragua are india rubber, bananas, cacao, cane sugar, cotton, corn, tobacco, rice, yams, sweet potatoes, bread fruit, and cocoanuts. The rubber trees are plentiful, and if properly developed by American enterprise the rubber business of the region would soon assume extensive proportions. The same may be said in regard to all the other products named. The exports of Nicaragua would be increased tenfold in a short time if the two desiderata of American enterprise and improved waterway communication were supplied. The soil is very rich, and the climate favorable for abundant crop yields of all the above-mentioned agricultural products, and many more besides.

Turning to another class of Nicaraguan products, the country contains some of the finest and most valuable forest growths to be found anywhere in the world. The principal trees are the mahogany, the cedar, the wild cotton tree, the lignum vitæ, the oak, the rosewood, many varieties of palms, dyewoods in abundance, and many other valuable and merchantable woods, some of which have no counterpart in our own forests. There is also a vast amount of medicinal plants and herbs, and also of textile plants, like pita, from which the strongest ropes are made, and agave, which yields the sisal hemp.

Cattle raising is another feature of the region, and the mineral resources of the country are believed to be almost boundless. There is gold in abundance, also silver, copper, tin, lead, and other metals, as testified by our own consuls and other good authorities.

It is important to remember that in all these branches of industry and production a great deal has already been done by the Nicaraguans themselves, and that the country is already in a flourishing state of development, so that immediately upon the opening of the canal and the improvement of the harbors the benefit of the increased commerce with that region would be felt by our own people. It is not as if it were a case of a new and wild and altogether undeveloped country. Its great lack hitherto has been of suitable means of communication with the outside world. When that communication is established on a proper scale, as contemplated in the canal scheme, and when aided by an additional infusion of American enterprise, the resources of Nicaragua will develop by leaps and bounds, and the chief beneficiary of our neighbor will be the United States.

The conditions are much the same as regards the other country along the line of the proposed canal—Costa Rica. In that favored land also there are bountiful agricultural products, a superb climate, inexhaustibly fertile soil, remarkable mineral wealth, and vast quantities of useful woods. Railways, manufacturing establishments, electrical plants, and other appliances of modern civilization have been introduced in both Nicaragua and Costa Rica to a considerable extent of late years, and with improved means of transportation between those countries and this country doubtless there will arise there a large demand for our labor-saving agricultural machinery. Labor is abundant in both countries, and not only extremely competent and reasonable in cost, but also very accommodating and willing in spirit, faithful and conscientious.

The commerce of both countries is steadily and rapidly increasing in spite of their lack of transportation facilities. Costa Rica does a total annual business with foreign countries amounting to more than $15,000,000, or an average of about $60 per capita of her population—a larger per capita than that of France, Italy, or Spain. Her trade, however, has been mostly with Europe. It will be a different story when the canal is built. Nicaragua's foreign commerce is of about the same volume as that of Costa Rica. With the construction of the canal it is easy to see what great advances could and would be made in their trade and commerce and what great advantages to the trade and commerce of the United States would accrue therefrom.

Objections have been raised to the fact that the route along the San Juan River and across Lake Nicaragua to the Pacific is through a wilderness and a virgin country. This I regard, Mr. President, as fortunate rather than otherwise. We have here no complex problems involving the control of a turbulent, disorderly, infected native population. The zone of the canal will be practically occupied only by the people under the immediate control of and connected with the canal construction. There are no towns, and there is no demand for any joint commission, having criminal or civil jurisdiction—none of the intricate and exasperating problems that are clearly indicated in the other case. I can not do better than to quote here from the testimony of Mr. Lyman E. Cooley, who examined the entire line in company with a number of gentlemen who were interested in the question of taking a contract for the construction of the canal.

Mr. TELLER. In what year was that?

Mr. HARRIS. Last year. The chairman asked Mr. Cooley this question:

The CHAIRMAN. I wish now to ask you as one having knowledge of the business of contracting on great works, as well as a knowledge of the business of engineering on great works, is it your opinion that American contractors can be obtained to complete the Panama Canal at the price estimated by the Panama Canal Commission? Do you remember what their price is?

Mr. COOLEY. One hundred and forty-six million dollars.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. Take all the conditions together, the health, and a man supplying his own labor, doing all the work and furnishing all the material.

Mr. COOLEY. I think you will be able to get men who will bid on the Panama Canal. I think you will get many more men of more mature judgment, and not so adventurous, who will bid on Nicaragua; and I think that of the class of men who ought to be considered as competent through experience to undertake this work, they would feel that there was more money to be made in building the Nicaragua Canal at the figures of the Commission than there is to be made in the building of the Panama Canal at the figures of the Commission. What that difference would be I do not know. My judgment is that they would load the Panama bid at least 20 per cent as compared with the Nicaragua.

The CHAIRMAN. When you take the $40,000,000 or the $50,000,000 we will have to pay for the Panama Canal and for the Colombian concessions, and expend that on the Nicaragua route, then as to the balance of the work, up to the estimates of the Commission, would you think that American contractors would have any difficulty in taking the Nicaragua route in preference to the Panama route as it is?

Mr. COOLEY. Without question. If that $40,000,000 could be spent with great intelligence and not in a rush, quietly expended, so as to get the full benefit of it, there would be no comparison in the two situations at the conclusion of that expenditure, in my judgment.

The CHAIRMAN. If I understand your testimony, then, Mr. Cooley, in a general way you are of opinion that the Nicaragua route is, after all, the cheapest route to construct?

Mr. COOLEY. I think that is true.

Speaking of the project, Mr. Cooley said on page 1084:

Mr. COOLEY. Yes; which is very much wider—30 feet wider—than the present project; and of that width of canal, in the whole route, there was less than 12 miles, as I recall, from sea level to sea level, at foot of locks at either end. Everything else was wider. The river division we did not treat as thoroughly as the canal divisions, because that was regarded as a work subject to betterment in the future. I think our dimensions were 200 feet wide on the bottom and 320 feet at bends, and 270 feet in Lake Nicaragua, if I remember right.

We made our canal for 36 feet of water, or 4 feet below the level of the miter sills, which were to be 32 feet. I believe that in these great rock cuts the bottom of the canal ought to be some feet below the level of the miter sills.

The locks were to be 80 feet by 700. I do not now recall the dimensions of the last proposition. I think they are a little wider, and about the same length. [84 by 740 feet.]

The river division was made 32 feet deep, with the idea of deepening in the future.

The work as a whole provided a better canal than is now estimated, through which a 10-knot vessel could pass in probably 24 to 26 hours, in place of 33, as estimated now.

I will say without hesitation that the estimates submitted by the last Commission are sufficient to cover such a canal, and I believe that if the Government wishes to entertain a proposition to build it from a syndicate of men, that people could be had who will agree to do it and will give sufficient bond.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you any objection to stating the aggregate amount of your estimate?

Mr. COOLEY. Yes; I do not think I should do that. That is private property.

The CHAIRMAN. I do not want to call for private property.

Mr. COOLEY. It has cost me a great deal of labor and time.

The CHAIRMAN. Was it greater or less than the estimate of the Isthmian Canal Commission?

Mr. COOLEY. Less.

Senator MILLARD. Do I understand that in dollars your estimate would be below the estimate that has been submitted here?

Mr. COOLEY. Yes.

Senator MILLARD. And your plan contemplated a wider canal?

Mr. COOLEY. Yes.

Senator MILLARD. And you contemplate double locks?

Mr. COOLEY. Yes. It would be, I think, a safe statement to say that under the present conditions of the market, as to materials and labor, a canal can be built of the dimensions and on the plan that I speak of for the aggregate Commission estimate. In speaking of estimates, however, I wish to be distinctly understood. They are valid only for a syndicate that undertakes the entire enterprise. I can not undertake to discount the cost under other conditions of design, management, and construction.

Senator KITTREDGE. Did your plans include the construction of harbors?

Mr. COOLEY. Yes.

I have some further testimony from Mr. Cooley, but with the consent of the Senate will simply have it printed without reading. The testimony referred to is as follows:

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. de Lesseps and his coadjutors endeavored to maintain before the public the original sea-level proposition. So they proposed to construct this canal in steps, and cut out a step at a time, and eventually reach a sea-level canal. There was no final plan as to how that should be done further than was covered in the contract with Eiffel for some steel locks.

Let me say in that connection that the United States undertook an investigation of this matter in President Grant's day by the appointment of a commission consisting of Daniel Ammen, Chief of the Bureau of Navigation; General Humphreys, Chief of Engineers, United States Army, and Carlisle Patterson, Chief of the Coast Survey; that these gentlemen reached a conclusion and published that conclusion in 1876, I think, declaring unanimously in favor of the Nicaragua route as the most practicable route.

That has stood as the judgment of the profession on that matter ever since, and it was advocated by our delegates at the conference at Paris, in 1879, I think, where we sent Mr. Menocal and Mr. Ammen and Mr. Johnson; that the English representatives and Russian representatives cooperated, and it was admitted generally that the Nicaragua route was the best route for a high-level canal; and the conference would have so decided, but as the matter progressed De Lesseps came before the conference with the proposition that this must be a sea-level canal, and on this condition the vote was for Panama, with a large number of the foreign delegates not voting. That is the history of the matter. That judgment stood on its merits as the judgment of American engineers until this last report.

Now, the Frenchmen never even claimed that their route was suitable for a high-level canal in comparison with Nicaragua until as a later proposition it became necessary to save their bacon by building a lock canal. There were good reasons for the American people entertaining a preference for Nicaragua, because that is the unbroken decision on the matter as the results of all investigations.

The CHAIRMAN. For a great many years.

Mr. COOLEY. Ever since 1876. I personally can see no reason for changing that judgment now.

Mr. COOLEY. I think it is a very unwise man who says that the sailing vessel as an agency of commerce has become obsolete. I think he is dealing with the appearance of things and not with the philosophy of them.

The point I was going to make further was this, that you are building this canal to save distance. You save 9,500 miles, we will say, by Panama, and you save 10,000 miles by Nicaragua from New Orleans to San Francisco by those routes. That is 5 per cent. You can afford to pay 5 per cent extra to save that 500 miles. If you are paying $190,000,000 for 9,500 miles saving, you can afford to pay $10,000,000 more to shorten that 500 miles more, assuming that the distance is worth the same as the 9,500 miles you have paid for. On that basis you can afford to pay $10,000,000 more for the Nicaragua Canal.

Take it on a further point. We will assume that a vessel can steam 3,000 miles for a dollar a ton. That is about the way of reckoning it when rates are running normally. On long routes it is something better than that. On a sailing route between San Francisco and Liverpool or Portland and Liverpool on wheat it is, say, a third of a mill per ton per mile. If you can save 500 miles, you save a sixth of a dollar on every ton of freight that is going through there. If it is 7,000,000 tons, that is $1,200,000 a year. Now, you have got $10,000,000 capital to your credit on account of saving this 500 miles, and you have got $1,200,000 a year in saving on the total traffic on the cost of running it by the shorter route. That is an offset against the excessive estimates for cost of operation and maintenance.

I say that, without prejudice, I hope, because I went down there without determined conviction and came back with a predilection for the Panama route that stayed by me for some months. It is so open down there, you can see things so plainly, you can see so clearly how you can divide the work up into sections and set contractors to work, that it produces a very strong impression on you at first, and I say that impression stayed with me for a long time, and until I had worked out in my mind clearly the preliminary programme by which the Nicaragua route should be put into a condition also to subdivide into contracts.

You are in a wilderness in much of Nicaragua. It is not easy to see things. The physical discomfort in getting around is simply enormous on the eastern division. Fortunately I had the good sense, I congratulate myself on that, to select men who were pioneer men, who had been doing pioneer work, not municipal contractors, but men who had been out against the frontier, and engineers of the same class, who would not be deterred by an unbroken wilderness. And one of these men remarked, in a very significant way, that if the country was cleared up, if there were roads where men could ride about with a buggy and get around comfortably, and if there were good hotels at convenient intervals, it would make every difference in the world in a man's mental attitude.

You may look for the average man who undertakes to examine these routes to be in favor of Panama for that reason. I did not discover anything in Nicaragua that was equal to an Arkansas canebrake in the St. Francis bottoms. I did not discover anything in the way of a forest that was equal to a Wisconsin forest. I did not discover anything in the way of insects that was equal to experiences I have had on the Missouri River bottoms in the State of Nebraska.

We looked particularly into the health conditions, and I am just as confident of the health conditions in Nicaragua as I am along the Gulf coast of the United States; and I am not as confident of the health conditions at Panama.

I believe that those conditions, the mere difference on that one thing of comparative health alone, will make the difference between a profit and a loss to a syndicate that undertakes to build these works. I believe, further, that if you will take the $40,000,000 with which it is proposed to buy the situation at Panama, and spend that sum judiciously in Nicaragua, and then recall this same Commission, there will not be a question of doubt as to the superiority of the Nicaragua route in the mind of any man who has signed this last report. That is my best judgment, and I am very firm in that conclusion.

The CHAIRMAN. Did the harbor at Colon impress you as a safe harbor, or an accessible one?

Mr. COOLEY. There are no harbors on the Panama route, any more than there are at Nicaragua. The harbor of Colon is absolutely untenable under any onshore wind. When we reached Colon every ship had been to sea for four days, and only reached port on the heels of the same storm in which we went down the Atlantic.

On the Panama side there has never been a harbor. There has been lighterage out to the anchorage, some 3 miles from shore, ever since there was a transit across the Isthmus. It is true there is an anchorage there, and that there is ample protection behind the islands in Panama Bay. They have developed this underwater cut of some 3 miles in length to La Boca, or to the landing stage, in connection with the Panama Railroad. That is only since 1899, I think.

At Greytown you have nothing. At Brito of course you have nothing. Four miles from Brito you have a small working harbor, San Juan del Sur, that will hold a few vessels, which gives you a temporary base on the Pacific.

The CHAIRMAN. Is San Juan del Sur a safe harbor?

Mr. COOLEY. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Deep water?

Mr. COOLEY. Oh, yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Four miles away from Brito?

Mr. COOLEY. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. To get to it you have got to sail up the coast and come into Brito?

Mr. COOLEY. It is one of those little bottle-shaped harbors, just big enough for a steamer to get into and turn around. All the Pacific Mail steamers run in there and land their mails for Nicaragua. It is the old port used by Vanderbilt in the Nicaragua transit. With a mere spur of a railroad running down there from Brito you can use it temporarily, until you can open up your works at Brito; so that problem solves itself.

There is absolutely no access at Greytown until you make it, except lighterage without shelter, but you can run out a pier for a couple of thousand feet, and do some dredging alongside, involving a moderate amount of work, and then you can get vessels in there drawing 12 and 15 feet of water; and when you have this foothold, you can do anything.

The conditions are most excellent on both shores for producing good harbors, and especially on the Pacific shore for producing a harbor that is much superior to anything that can be produced at Panama. I think possibly they can produce one at Colon as good as at Greytown; but as proposed now the harbor in either case is in the mouth of the canal, simply an enlargement of a canal section.

The CHAIRMAN. How would the floods in the San Juan compare with the floods in the Chagres?

Mr. COOLEY. The floods in the San Juan proper?

The CHAIRMAN. I mean from San Carlos.

Mr. COOLEY. The floods in the San Juan proper are nominal. It is a lake-controlled stream, and you could hardly speak of floods there, only in a minor degree from local streams, any more than you could down the St. Lawrence or on the Great Lakes. There is a variation in the volume of the water, but nothing in the nature of a flood as we understand the word "flood."

Mr. HARRIS. In further consideration of the physical features of the canal, I desire also to call attention to what has been said by the technical commission of engineers appointed by the Panama Canal Company in their report of December 16, 1898. That is the international commission to which I alluded and to which the Senator from Ohio alluded the other day as a commission of great ability. The commission, composed of some of the ablest engineers in Europe, clearly and distinctly condemned first the possibility of a sea-level canal. They also clearly and distinctly condemned the plan of the canal which has been adopted by our Canal Commission. Their report is found in Senate Document No. 303, and from page 60 of that document I read as follows:

The technical commission has uniformly adopted as principles from which no deviation was allowed in the several studies and which restricted their scope: (1) Every solution must be rejected a priori which, in itself, and apart from any consideration of time and expense, does not present absolute guaranty of certain success.

I think that, while applied there to a comparison of different plans of specific work, it applies with absolute certainty to the consideration of the two routes. As I have said before, absolute certainty of success is the first essential. You must not undertake a canal which will prove a failure in construction and which will exhaust the patience of the country in the expenditure either of time or money. We can not undertake any doubtful proposition. We must have, as far as it is possible in human wisdom, certainty of success before us.

The Commission continue:

(2) In preparing the plans of the several structures required by so important and complicated a work, such types only should be adopted as have been proved to be satisfactory by experience, barring out all innovations which might lead to failure. (3) In the examination of all questions, the special conditions under which the work is to be executed should be taken into account, as well as the characteristics of the climate, the influence of which may show itself in the inferior quality of labor and in the reduced efficiency of the personnel which directs it. Hence the necessity to plan only simple structures requiring no special conditions in the means of execution.

In every study are found, as principal questions to solve, the three fundamental problems which arose in all plans prepared previous to those of the new company, viz, possible depth of the central cut; mode of water supply; mode of controlling the Chagres freshets.

They considered the height of the lake; they determined that it is necessary to have a dam across the Chagres at Bohio; that there must be an artificial lake there, and in speaking of that they say:

Considering the importance of that structure in relation to the safety of the canal itself, it was deemed that here more than anywhere else it was necessary to be very cautious, and consequently the maximum elevation of 20 meters (65.6 feet) was fixed upon as that of the level of the lake to be formed by the building of the Bohio Dam.

They also state that it is absolutely necessary to provide for a dam at Alajuela, entirely omitted in the estimates of our Commission.

On page 64 they say:

The elaborate discussion of the conditions to be fulfilled in order to harmonize the regulation of the Chagres freshets with the exigencies of water supply for the canal has established the necessity of making provision for two large reservoirs or artificial lakes. The first one, comprising the central region of the canal and containing one of the levels thereof, would be formed by the building of the Bohio Dam (P. K. 24), and would have a maximum flood height fixed at elevation 20 meters (65.6 feet) or thereabouts.

On page 66 they say:

The advisability of building the Alajuela Dam, with its storage reserve, even in the case that a feeder should become unnecessary (on account of Lake Bohio forming the summit level)—

Which is the plan indicated by our Commission—results from two main considerations: First. The abandonment of Lake Alajuela would lead to the concentration of all the surplus flood waters in the Bohio Lake, which would be possible only by giving the dam an increase of several meters more in height, a scheme unanimously looked upon as over bold—

That is precisely the proposition which our Commission recommends.

Mr. STEWART. What is the height which our Commission recommends?

Mr. HARRIS. Our Commission makes the height of the dam 90 feet, and this Commission says that 65.6 feet is the limit of safety—"a scheme unanimously looked upon as over bold."

Mr. HANNA. May I ask the Senator from what page he is reading?

Mr. HARRIS. Page 66 of Senate Document No. 303, being the report of the technical commission. They continue—or by lowering the minimum level of the lake as well as that of the bottom of the central cut by several meters, which is not admissible. Second. The abandonment of the upper lake, which constitutes the first regulator of the Chagres floods, would allow that river to enter furiously that portion of the canal territory occupied by the Bohio Lake, where are found, for several kilometers near the point of ingress, bends and natural narrows where the total volume of the freshets would certainly produce currents detrimental and dangerous to navigation.

On page 69, speaking of the second type, the commission say:

In the one a single lake only is to be built—Lake Bohio—and it must provide for all necessities—the water supply and operation of the canal and the regulation of the freshets of the Chagres. In this system, the bottom of the summit level being established at elevation 10 meters (32.8 feet), the maximum level of its water surface, which would be also that of the lake, could reach elevation 24.50 meters (80.4 feet) in the large freshets, and the Bohio Dam should be raised to elevation 27.50 meters (90.2 feet), which would be about 30 meters (98.4 feet) above its foundations. In the other a first lake would be formed on the Upper Chagres by the Alajuela Dam; the function of this lake would be to store up all water needed for supplying and operating the canal, as well as a great portion (the largest) of the excess of the freshets.

In that case, the bottom of the summit level remaining practically at the same elevation as before, the maximum level of Lake Bohio would not exceed elevation 29.50 meters (67.3 feet), and the dam would remain very nearly within the limits established for all the plans of the first type. This solution is the only one meeting the conditions for the regulating of the freshets without giving the Bohio Dam such portions as are considered too bold. On that account principally, and also by reason of the advantages which, in any event, the Alajuela Dam presents by providing a considerable hydraulic power and by permiting a preliminary regulation of the Chagres before entering the canal territory, it has appeared proper to adopt this solution preferably to the first.

Mr. President, it seems to me we may be pardoned for differing even with the eminent engineers who constitute the Isthmian Canal Commission in view of the fact——

Mr. TELLER. What was it from which the Senator read?

Mr. HARRIS. The report of the international commission to the French company.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator to state what reason they give for limiting to 65 feet, if they do.

Mr. HARRIS. I thought I had stated it—on account of the pressure upon the dam. They consider it too great a head for a dam to withstand with the foundation there and a dam of the character which they propose to build.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to say that they were French engineers and not American engineers, or they would not have been scared at a 65-foot dam.

Mr. HARRIS. You have to take into consideration the character of the foundation.

Mr. TELLER. I have examined into the question, and I find that the foundation is all right.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I will take up, as the Senator suggested, some consideration of this dam. Not only have we the opinion of these engineers that it is necessary to have a lower dam at Bohio, but that it is also absolutely necessary to have a dam at Alajuela, creating a lake on the upper waters of the Chagres for the sake of restraining the floods of that stream and preventing them, as they say, from rushing furiously at right angles into the canal. But our engineers differ among themselves as to what should be done in this case. Among the members of the Commission there was by no means unanimity with regard to the plan proposed.

The map on the western wall of the Senate Chamber shows the geological valley of the Chagres. It shows there that to an enormous depth, a hundred and twenty-eight feet below the sea level, which is 8 feet below the level of the Chagres River, making really a hundred and thirty-seven feet as the depth of water which has to be penetrated, there is a great mass of sand and gravel mixed with streaks of clay. The Commission itself considered it unsafe to put upon that any sort of a superstructure without sinking something as an impervious curtain clear down to the solid rock.

They made borings at various points two or three hundred feet apart, and they determined that the rock existed in that as indicated on the map there. The pneumatic work is some thirteen hundred and fourteen feet. It is 8 feet below the Chagres, and the pneumatic head must be considered all the time as having 8 feet added to the distances estimated as below sea level. Thirteen hundred and fourteen feet of that has to be done by pneumatic work, and of that more than half, as you will see by the profile there, is, at these great depths, from a hundred and twenty-four to a hundred and twenty-six feet below sea level.

Mr. Morison, who was highly commended by the Senator from Ohio, and for whom I have the highest admiration, as I know something of his magnificent work in sinking foundations for our Western bridges, piers, and abutments—and I think no one in this country knows more about pneumatic work than Mr. Morison—does not regard that as the best plan, and he substitutes another. The question of doing pneumatic work at that depth is one of tremendous difficulty, and is admitted by all persons to be so. The greatest depth to which pneumatic work has been done here is about 115 feet.

At depths of about 100 feet, as testified to by Mr. Noble and others, men can work only one hour at a time and three hours out of the twenty-four, and that it involves loss of life and a great deal of serious physical injury. They have to be picked men. At 135 to 137 feet the pressure is 60 pounds per square inch, and you can readily imagine what men would have to stand to do work with that enormous atmospheric pressure.

Mr. Noble, I believe, thought that possibly at 128 feet men might work for three-quarters of an hour at a time, but very able engineers have suggested that the question of temperature has to be taken into consideration, and so have the French engineers indicated. The depths at which we have worked in this country have been where the temperature has seldom been over 40° or 50°. Down there the thermal temperature is said to be from 80° to 90°. That again constitutes a tremendous difficulty in the prosecution of such a work.

Mr. Morison, in the Proceedings of the American Society of Civil Engineers for January, has a paper which I think will be found of great interest to the Senate. It begins:

All engineers who have examined the route of the Panama Canal agree that the neighborhood of Bohio is the only available location for the dam by which the summit level must be maintained. On the other hand, there have been wide differences of opinion as to how this dam should be constructed, and how high it could safely be built. While it would be an exaggeration to say that the conditions met here are unprecedented, they call for engineering skill and judgment of the highest order. A dam built to meet the requirements which have been imposed in other localities would be enormously expensive. The real skill of an engineer is shown in designing the least expensive safe structure adapted to the particular case in hand, even though it may not comply with requirements commonly demanded.

On page 3 he says:

Permeable sand and gravel are found in the lowest part of the geological channel, overlaid by a heavy and tight blanket of finer alluvial deposit. There are strong probabilities that this permeable material connects with the river either above or below, or both, the evidence of this being that when a pipe is driven into this material the water in the pipe stands at the same level as that in the river.

On page 8 he says:

The technical commission—

From whose report I have read—

The technical commission, to whom the entire scheme of the new Panama Company was submitted for approval, thought it wise to limit the head of water against this dam to about 66 feet, or 20 meters. There seems to have been no reason for this particular limit, except the general judgment of the engineers forming the commission that it was not wise to expose an earth dam to a greater pressure of water.

On page 10 he says:

The plan adopted by the Isthmian Canal Commission was designed to resist a normal head of water of 90 feet, or about 25 feet more than the limit arbitrarily adopted for the French dam.

* * * * * * *

The design involves the extension of pneumatic work to unprecedented depths, and involves special details in making the joints between the caissons tight.

The location selected for this dam is below that chosen by the French engineers, and practically at right angles to the French dam, the length of the dam, as well as the cross section of the valley, on this line being double that on the French location. The desire to limit the depth of pneumatic work led to the selection of this line, but it is possible that additional borings might find a deeper hole here.

Mr. Morison, when testifying before the Commission, admitted that, the borings being from 200 to 300 feet apart, it was impossible to tell what further crevices and depressions there might be found in the bedrock. He says:

There can be little doubt that a dam of this character can be built.

Mr. Morison, I remember, at one of the hearings before the committee several years ago testified that nothing was impossible, given money and time enough.

It involves novel and untried features. Few engineers, even among those who feel that they could construct it, would be ready to say in advance how the work would be done. The difficulties, taken in connection with the climate and other surroundings, are enormous.

He then proceeds to give the total cost, and he provides for a temporary dam, and says it is necessary for the Commission's plan, and his table has a singular mistake in it, figuring pneumatic work 108,410 yards at $21.50. It should be $29.50 per cubic yard as the figure given by the Commission. So the total cost of the dam, with the temporary dam he suggests, $885,445, should be $9,146,850 on the Commission's plan. He says, on page 17:

None of the foregoing estimates includes any provision for a temporary dam by which the waters of the Chagres would be diverted through some other route during the construction of the permanent dam.

Therefore he adds the $885,000 which I have mentioned.

Mr. Morison proceeds to recommend an earth dam of an enormous size. I believe Mr. Morison's theory is really the best solution of the problem. He says of it further, on page 20:

This, however, does not tell the full story. On the American Isthmus the difficulties attending the use of skilled labor are very great. The amount of skilled labor required on the French dam is comparatively small; the Commission's plan requires a large amount; in the third plan—

Which is Mr. Morison's—

the use of skilled labor is practically limited to the construction of the temporary steel dam and its masonry foundation. The third plan—really means the construction of an elevated plateau of very large dimensions, the surface area of the earth filling between the rock-fill dams being 57 acres. These dimensions may almost be called stupendous.

The Morison plan—

His plan contemplates the construction of an enormous rock-fill dam, of the full height required, 90 feet, and then some two thousand or twenty-two hundred feet lower down another dam similar to that, except lower, and the filling in of this enormous space, flanked by the hills of the valley, with material to be taken from the body of the canal—earth and gravel and all the materials to be dumped in there—which would be placing a mountain across the valley of the Chagres River.

There has been a good deal of discussion in the Society of Civil Engineers with regard to this matter. In the March number of the proceedings of the Society of Civil Engineers are some discussions to which I wish to call attention. Mr. Burr, who was one of the Commission, and is a member of the Society of Civil Engineers, said:

In reality, that excessive and erratic variation in the strata of material disclosed by the borings is one of the most striking features of the whole situation. It exhibits clearly, among other things, the danger of drawing any conclusions as to the impermeability of the upper strata of material, which, as Mr. Morison indicates, are either clay or sand, or a mixture of the two. Further, it is essential, in dealing with this general question, to realize fully that the order of the strata as found at one section may be radically different in one or more of the other sections; indeed, that is generally the case.

Further than that, at the same elevation and in the same section, practically clear coarse sand may be disclosed by one boring, and blue clay with little sand by another boring perhaps not more than 300 feet away. Again, yellow clay and sand may be found at the surface of one of the same borings and at 128 feet below the surface in the other. Indeed, the one persistent feature of the disclosures by the borings is the utter lack of uniformity of conditions on which any conclusions common to different sections can be based. The masses of material seem to be in the most irregular and irregularly limited strata or pockets.

He says further:

The limits of impermeable areas have not been defined and can not be predicted from the information gained by the Commission in its borings.

Again:

In these observations material which has been called sand is in some cases coarse enough to be classed as gravel. It will thus be seen that the total statement of the information actually disclosed by the borings at the various sites demonstrates conclusively a probability so strong as to amount to practical certainty that not only is the water of the river now in free connection with the pervious substrata of sand and gravel, but that the water of the lake, with its 90 feet additional head, would be a much freer connection.

Now, something has been said with regard to the possibility of pumping down the water where the caissons are being sunk and thus relieving the pneumatic head and relieving the pressure upon the men at work. Mr. Burr—and I desire in discussing this to be perfectly frank and to give the arguments on both sides—thinks something can be done in that direction. He says:

It is to be anticipated that water stands in the substrata at practically the elevation of the water in the river, or at least at sea level, but if pits are excavated in that plateau down into the pervious strata, ample experience shows that the water in them could readily be pumped down to a considerable amount, which the writer believes would prove to be not less than 30 or 40 feet, with reasonable pump capacity.

That seems to be a very singular statement. I can imagine that in the small area occupied by a shaft, or even a pier of a bridge, pumps might work so as to relieve to some extent the pneumatic pressure, but these caissons are to be 30 by 100 feet, and as you proceed from one shore along the strata becomes loosened up, and the water has freer and freer access, and while you might possibly by enormus pumps reduce the head of water at one or two of the caissons nearest to the banks before going farther, it would be absolutely impossible to reduce that head to an extent which would relieve the pneumatic pressure at great depth.

You must remember that you can create a little saucer-shaped depression in water which would relieve to a certain extent within a few feet of that height; but pneumatic pressure comes from all sides, and water has pneumatic pressure laterally as well as vertically, and with that vast mass of material saturated with water, when you come down to depths below 100 feet it would still have the same pneumatic pressure as though you had no pumps in operation at all.

I find that view sustained by Mr. Morison himself. Mr. Morison, in the Proceedings of the American Society of Civil Engineers for May, on page 476, says:

Mr. Burr proposes to reduce his head for the pneumatic work by lowering the surface of the water from 30 to 40 feet around the caissons, which he believes could be done with reasonable pump capacity. If this can be done, it is the best possible evidence that the seepage will not be serious. To reduce the water pressure it is not only necessary to lower the water immediately around the caissons, but to take out enough water to reduce the head of saturation by 30 or 40 feet. Unless this is done, although the surface of the water may be lowered, the head of water against which atmospheric pressure must be provided will not be reduced.

There were some other engineers who commented upon this proposition. Mr. Edward P. North, who has been mentioned before, on page 310 of the Proceedings for March, says:

There seems to be an ambiguity as to the exact depth, as in one part of the Commission's report a minimum depth of 128 feet below tide is mentioned, and another part of the same report reads that the cofferdam is to be 8 feet above tide.

Of course by inference that simply grows out of the fact that they had some measurements from the sea-level line and others from the level of the Chagres at low water, which is 8 feet above sea level.

As the dam site is some 13 miles inland, it is assumed, subject to correction, that the air pressure in the caissons will be that due to 136 feet of water, or, virtually, 5 atmospheres.

It is assumed, and all will readily agree, that healthy men sustain small inconveniences when working 4-hour shifts under pressures of about 50 feet, but at 75 feet deaths are to be expected, and at 100 to 110 feet they occur with unpleasant frequency even among picked men; also, that in the Great Lakes 110 feet is about the limit of divers' work.

All these experiences have been had when the temperature of the water has been between 40° and 50° F. Whereas at the Bohio dam site the temperature of the water is about 90°, as the mean annual temperature—which governs, approximately, the temperature of deep-seated springs—is about 90°; and further, this is the temperature assumed by Mr. Allen Hazen in his percolation formula for that locality. This high temperature in the caissons must add materially to the distress of those working in them.

When to these difficulties is added the fact that, as far back as the seventeenth century, maps have designated the Caribbean front of the Panama route as "The Place of Bones," an evil reputation that has ever since been maintained, the necessity, as implied in this paper, for designing the least expensive safe structure adapted to the particular case in hand is apparent. Unless the head of water in the Chagres River can be pumped down to reduce the pressure in the caissons so that life will not be in great jeopardy, a procedure that is probably practicable during low-water flow of the river, the saying of forty years ago, "that each tie on the Panama Railroad cost a human life," will be repeated as to the depths in feet to which the caissons are sunk.

Mr. Theodore Paschke, an engineer member of the society, says on page 313 of the same volume:

Indeed, the writer is of the opinion that it is only a question of time when the whole artificial lake which the proposed dam will form will be filled with silt—

He had been arguing in favor of Mr. Morison's plan, because he believed that the silt brought down by the river will seal hermetically the front face of the rock-fill dam proposed by Mr. Morison—which the proposed dam will form will be filled with silt, except the channel necessary for the Chagres waters to flow either to the spillway during floods or to the locks of the canal, and that if no provision is made for such exigency the ulterior object of creating this artificial lake will be defeated.

Mr. Edmund Duryea, jr., speaking of Mr. Morison's plan, said:

Mr. Morison states that the criticism made on his plan is that "it permits seepage through the permeable sand and gravel in the lower part of the geological valley."

His plan makes no attempt to prevent or diminish this seepage, and he contents himself with showing that the amount of water thus lost is relatively unimportant. It is just possible, however, that the actual amount of seepage might prove to be much larger than he believes can be the case, and it is this possibility which seems to be the objectionable feature of the plan. This objection will be removed if any practicable plan can be found which will prevent or diminish the amount of seepage. Such a plan will be most reassuring and most effective if it is of such a nature that it can be applied either before or after the construction of the dam.

There are a great many other comments, all of interest, upon the plans, showing a great difference of opinion, whereas when it comes to the construction of the Conchuda dam, which is the corresponding feature on the Nicaragua line, there is absolutely no difference of opinion and no criticism whatever. The only difference of opinion with regard to that is that of Mr. Cooley, who thinks that a cheaper form of dam, but equally effective, can be substituted. The foundations go there to the absolutely solid rock. It is less than one-half of the length of the other.

I wish Senators would pay some attention to this profile, which is enlarged, as the others are, from the maps of the Commission itself. It will be found that these caissons sink down squarely into the rock. It is found that the borings there have gone down from 15 to 20 feet into the rock. The foundation is absolutely determined from bank to bank. The boring holes have been put in from 50 to 100 feet apart; in some cases 25 feet apart. Not only that, but three parallel lines of them have been put down. The greater part of the caissons will be sunk on what is practically the shore of the river. Only four of them are in the river. Only two of them go down to the greatest depth of minus 25. The total height of the dam is plus 97. That gives the entire elevation 122 feet as the total height of superstructure from its lowest point to its highest point, in comparison with 228 feet in the other dam.

On the other dam, as I said, the pneumatic work is 1,314 feet. In this case it is 731 feet, and with an elevation rising only 122 feet from the lowest point of the foundation. The height of the caissons gradually rise so that the great part of them will be sunk at not to exceed minus 10 or minus 6 feet below the level of the ocean.

Mr. President, if you will examine the detailed map I think you will discover some very remarkable features. Here is the detailed map of the Commission [exhibiting], showing the Conchuda dam. Absolutely every detail is worked out. There are no problems there which have not been solved. A contractor can take this plan and proceed upon the work. He knows absolutely what he is going to do.

Every engineer concedes that such a dam will be absolutely effective, and that it is easily within the limits of well-known engineering experience. The discussion of the Bohio dam indicates differences of opinion. Engineers who advocate the plan of the Commission admit the difficulty of sinking those enormous caissons 100 feet absolutely straight. They have to be sunk down straight, and the core wall, as it is called, 30 feet thick, is built upon them. As a result, I forget the number of different caissons, but you simply have a series of columns of concrete more or less in contact, and they have to be made water-tight afterwards. Their plan is a semicircular cavity in each one of these columns of concrete, which will be kept parallel to each other, and after they are put down concrete will be poured into those holes and thus hermetically sealed.

That has been denied as possible by a great many engineers, and, even with your enormously expensive core wall, the impossibility of obtaining impermeability seems to be conceded all around. There will be more or less leakage. It is conceded that this core wall has no strength in itself, but that the entire retaining power of the dam is found in the great rock-fill dams that come up on each side of it.

As to the question of earthquake shocks, can you imagine anything more easily affected by an earthquake shock than an enormous dam 228 feet high, composed of practically isolated columns 30 feet thick and 100 feet long, without any tie whatever connecting them, and merely held in place by loose rock on each side?

It is a great risk, Mr. President, and while I am perfectly willing to concede that it can be done, as other engineers have said it can be done, and I do not pretend to say that the Commission is not reasonably safe in saying it can be done, yet the uncertainties, as was admitted by Colonel Ernst and by several others of the engineers who were before the committee, are very great, and the difficulties and loss of life will be something enormous.

In the plan which the Commission has prepared of the Bohio Dam they simply give a profile and a cross section and suggestion as to the core wall. They do not show that their borings go down into the solid rock. They are 200 and 300 feet apart. It is admitted that there may be unknown difficulties and unknown depths to be encountered between those borings.

It is the element of uncertainty, Mr. President, in the construction of this gigantic work that makes me pause and hesitate before I can possibly consent to it, before I can think that there will be any of the other advantages that may be enumerated in behalf of the Panama Canal.

There are some other points with regard to the physical matters. As a matter of course, the Culebra cut is the most gigantic piece of excavation that has ever been undertaken. It is 8 miles long. There are still 43,000,000 cubic yards of earth to be removed. I noticed in one of the New York papers a comparison was made between that and the cut at Tamborcito, on the other line. The cut at Tamborcito has greater height. It is a sharp peak, but it only measures 3,000 feet from the entrance of the cut to the other end of the cut. It is composed of rock, which will be used in the construction of the dam, and it will become really a valuable quarry in that respect. Every particle of rock taken from it will be utilized. It contains an insignificant amount. The idea of comparing a cut 3,000 feet long with a cut 8 miles long is too absurd to contemplate for a moment.

Mr. MITCHELL. It has only 18,000,000 cubic yards.

Mr. HARRIS. It has only 18,000,000 cubic yards, as against 43,000,000 in the Culebra cut.

Now, then, with regard to curvatures. My distinguished friend the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HANNA], to whom I am willing to accord all of the experience and the ability which are justly his, with regard to some matters connected with transportation, sailing vessels, etc., has had a good deal to say about the difficulties involved in the curvatures.

It is true, Mr. President, that there is some curvature, a greater length of curve line, as a matter of course, in the Nicaragua Canal; it is a longer line. It has 70.51 miles of lake; it has 49.64 miles of river; it has 46.17 miles on the eastern division and 17.34 miles on the western division. There are really 63.51 miles actual, distinct canalization. That is really to my mind a somewhat proper measure of the differences between these two canals. There are 63.51 miles of canal on one as against thirty-three and some hundredths on the other. Lake Bohio will give lake navigation for 13 miles, and on the other route there is improved river navigation to the extent of 49.64 miles and 70.51 of lake navigation.

Now about the curves. Let us see which is the sharpest curve on either line. When I use the expression "sharp" I want to be able to give an explanation of it. I inquired of my friend the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. HANNA] the other day what he meant by saying that one curve was twice or three times as sharp as another. I understand that that occurred in certain questions which he had propounded to certain sea captains, etc.

I am sorry that his speech has not been printed, because I should like to have seen those questions exactly as they were; but it was my understanding that the assertion was made that on the Nicaraguan line the curves were two or three times as sharp as on the Panama line. Now, that must necessarily mean, if it means anything, that the curves on the Nicaraguan line have one-half or one-third of the radius that the curves on the Panama Canal line have. We need be in no doubt with regard to that. On page 99 of the Commission's report we find the following table of curvatures on the Panama line:

Number of curves.	Length.	Radius.	Total curvature.
	Miles.	Feet.	° ′
1	0.88	19,629	14 17
1	.48	13,123	11 04
4	4.22	11,483	111 32
15	11.61	9,842	355 50
4	2.44	8,202	90 20
2	1.67	6,562	77 00
1	.73	6,234	35 45
1	.82	3,281	75 51
Total	22.85		771 39

So we have on the Panama line the sharpest curve that occurs on either line. I am perfectly willing to concede, as the Commission states, that they have provided a sufficient width of channel, so that that is not injurious. They stated in their report, as they did before the committee, that wherever a curvature existed they had provided for additional width of channel, and that there was no curve on either line which presented any particular difficulty in operation.

There has been a good deal said about having a tug at one end and a tug at the other. That has occurred, I believe, on the Manchester Canal, where vessels have to pass around a curvature of less than 2,000 feet; but the idea of making curvature in this case an essential difficulty is simply imaginary, in my judgment, and is not worthy of consideration.

Let me give some facts in regard to the curvature on the other route. Of course there are a great number of miles of curvature. The total degrees of curvature are greater, but the smallest curve that exists on the other has a radius of 4,045 feet. The next is 4,175 feet. The next is 4,297 feet. The next is 4,911 feet. Then there is one of 4,982 feet, and then it runs from 5,000 on up to 17,000 feet. So in no single case does a curve exist that is twice as sharp as the other, or that bears any relation to such an expression, or that presents any difficulty in navigation.

Mr. HANNA. As the Senator has referred to the statement I made, I want to give my authority. It is found in the testimony of Colonel Ernst, on page 613:

Colonel Ernst submits a statement taken from the report of the Commission as to the curves and radius of the same on both the Panama and Nicaragua routes. That table shows that on the Nicaragua route there are 56 curves and on the Panama 29, the total curvature on the Nicaragua route being more than three times that of the Panama route.

That is what I intended to say.

Mr. HARRIS. That is perfectly intelligible.

Mr. HANNA. I was criticised by the Senator for making that statement.

Mr. HARRIS. Not at all. If the Senator will pardon me, that was not exactly the statement which he made. As I remember, the questions were that one curve was——

Mr. HANNA. Three times as sharp.

Mr. HARRIS. Three times as sharp as the other.

Mr. HANNA. That was the language I used and that is the source of information. Now, one word more, and then I will not interrupt the Senator again. He has just emphasized the fact that there is one curve on the Panama Canal that is sharper than any curve on the Nicaragua Canal. That is hardly a fair statement of the case, because——

Mr. HARRIS. I read from the tables of the Commission.

Mr. HANNA. Very well; then I will take the tables of the Commission with the explanation I made, that the curve is immediately at the entrance of the proposed improvement of Colon Harbor, which is already a harbor, and the lee is made by projection, so that the docks are built under the lee of this projection. It was the proposition of the engineers, in order to avail themselves of that lee, to use those docks already built as the opening to the canal, and vessels coming in would go up to the dock before they would start through the canal.

Now, in making that turn around the headland they have made the sharpest curve that is made, and to accommodate that they widen out the bay, which is a natural bay there, five or six hundred feet. It can go up to one thousand or two thousand feet. It is 800 feet now. It is simply a question of rounding the headland and coming up to the dock. It has nothing to do with the passage of the canal or the canal proper.

Mr. HARRIS. I wish to be perfectly fair. I said it was at the entrance of the canal and that the channel was of such width it made absolutely no difference; it did not affect it at all. I simply claim that the Commission has provided everywhere, on both routes, for this question of curvature. There is no difficulty. The only point I am seeking to offset is the argument which the Senator from Ohio made in the hypothetical question or the real question which he propounded to the shipmasters as to which route they would prefer.

In those questions it was distinctly stated, as I understood it, that curves existed two or three times as sharp on the Nicaragua line as existed on the Panama line. The truth of the matter is that that is not the fact. There may be—let us suppose a case—four curves each of 1,000 feet radius, each describing a quadrant of 90 degrees, and constituting 360 degrees of curvature. Another curve may be only 90 degrees, 1 quadrant, of the same radius, but the four curves will circle 360 degrees, but certainly are not four times as sharp as the one which only describes a quadrant of 90 degrees, but are just the same in that respect. It is that distinction I am trying to make plain.

Now, here is what Admiral Walker has to say in regard to the navigation of the canal. Admiral Walker was asked by Senator Hanna:

Senator HANNA. Do you think that any large ship—the maximum-sized ship—operating in this canal could go around these bends without the aid of a tug? I mean steamships or otherwise.

Admiral WALKER. I think they would go without a tug by both canals.

Senator HANNA. Could they make all the turns?

Admiral WALKER. I think so.

Senator HANNA. Suppose the wind was blowing pretty hard?

Admiral WALKER. If there was a strong breeze, it might occasionally cause some trouble. By the Nicaragua line there would at times be a considerable current from the lake to the Conchuda dam; with a strong wind blowing and a strong current they might have difficulty without a tug, but under ordinary circumstances I think they would go through without difficulty.

Senator HARRIS. Did not the Commission work out this question of curvature in detail in such a manner as to show clearly that no curvature is estimated in this work which would involve any difficulty in a vessel passing through there?

Admiral WALKER. I think there are no curves that would involve any particular difficulty, ordinarily. Of course, with a strong wind blowing or with a strong current a large ship might get into some trouble.

Senator HARRIS. That might happen anywhere on either route.

Admiral WALKER. Yes; but both routes are practically good enough for steamers to pass through with their own power.

Mr. President, with regard to this effect of wind, certainly if any difficulty was to be apprehended I do not know why the impression is made that there is a steady breeze blowing straight up the San Juan River all the time, a 16-knot breeze. The trade winds pass over that depression in the mountains. There is air in motion. But the San Juan River, as our friend insists, is an extremely tortuous stream. It is surrounded by high hills on each side. It is a forest-covered country, and there could be no great trouble from winds in that locality.

On the Suez Canal, which is built across the desert, where the winds of the desert sweep perpetually at right angles to the canal, a much narrower canal, there has never been any great difficulty so far as winds are concerned, and there will be none here. Sailing vessels have to pass through with a tug; steam vessels under ordinary circumstances unquestionably, as Admiral Walker indicates, would pass through with their own power.

Now, as to the harbors. Much stress has been laid upon the superior advantages of the Panama line in this respect. I concede, Mr. President, that there is an advantage in having harbors of a character at least sufficient for immediate use, and there will be some convenience in such harbors as now exist at Colon and Panama. In spite of the boasted superiority of the Panama route, however, we find the Commission estimating for the cost of the harbor at Colon $8,057,707; and even then it will have many objections. It is a harbor opening to the north, and whenever the northers blow here it has been established beyond question that all shipping is obliged to put to sea or to take refuge at Porto Bello.

I was surprised to find that in spite of all that had been said of the difficulties at Greytown the Commission estimates only $2,198,000 as necessary to provide an absolutely safe harbor at that point. Thirty thousand dollars is estimated as the cost of maintaining the harbor at Colon, and an indefinite estimate, which is admittedly based upon a very vague idea as to the amount of dredging which may or may not have to be done, is made for Greytown of $100,000, and is included in the cost of maintenance. So far as Panama is concerned, it can hardly be called a harbor but, as there are no winds, anchorage out in the open roadstead is assumed to be safe; and 4½ miles of a deep channel has to be completed to secure proper depth of water.

The estimate for the cost of the Brito harbor and entrance, including jetty, is only a million and a half. Admiral Walker says there is no particular difficulty in making it, and that it would be a perfectly good harbor, and that when once made it would require no very great cost for maintenance. It would take care of itself pretty much. There would be occasionally a little work, but not much. It is conceded that at San Juan del Sur, on the Pacific side, there is a safe and sufficient harbor for the preliminary work. The same can be found at a point not far from Greytown with but little difficulty. It seems to me the advantages which have been so much dilated upon as to the superiority of the harbors on the Panama line absolutely disappear.

Mr. President, it is not necessary for Senators on either side of this question to enter into protestations of the sincerity of their motives. There is no one who desires to impugn the motives of any member of this body. Certainly I would be the last man in the world to impute to anyone any improper motives. We have the right here to differ, we have the right to give our arguments, and we have a right to our opinions as to what is proper and just. To me there is no sectional consideration in this matter. No one section of the country is to be benefited, but the entire country is to be benefited. The canal is to my mind of great importance as a great measure of national defense.

I had hoped that a treaty could have been negotiated with Great Britain which would permit vessels engaged in our coastwise trade to pass through the canal absolutely free of tolls, and I regretted exceedingly that that was not provided for in the treaty. I understand that it is a possibility, but we should have it clearly and distinctly stated that no other power has a right to interfere with regulations which we may see fit to make as to our coastwise trade. I wanted the canal to be just as free to our coastwise trade as the mouth of the Mississippi River or as the entrance to New York Harbor. Our own ships, anything covered by the American flag, engaged in our domestic commerce, ought to go through the canal without the payment of toll. That is the view I take of it.

For that reason, I desire to again emphasize my reluctance to see the country committed to the construction of a canal which will be a bar forever to the use of sailing vessels. I do not believe that sailing vessels are to be thrown aside in this country, with its great coast line, with its magnificent supplies of timber, with the energy of a half dozen men who can get together, more particularly in the great State of Maine, where they can build a schooner and own her and operate her by a separate and independent little partnership. That is the kind of traffic that I believe we have to rely upon as against the great shipping trust. I want to see the independence of the individual preserved and promoted in every possible way, and I can not think it possible that this country is going to spend these hundreds of millions of dollars in the construction of a canal through which the sailing vessel never can pass with any certainty of reaching its destination at a given time.

I have here, and other Senators have had it laid upon their desks, a report of the Hydrographic Office. I have given the distances; but I should like to have Senators look at the diagram and see the differences in the route which is to be sailed. A sailing vessel, if a canal is constructed on the Panama route, will have to go south of the equator from June to November, and from January to May it is pretty nearly the same. It is prohibition absolutely to the sailing vessel. The unfortunate thing about the Suez Canal has been that, owing to the difficult navigation and the variable winds of the Red Sea, it is practically not used by sailing ships. That is an unfortunate necessity. In this case we have a choice of routes.

I do not know, Mr. President, that I have anything further at present that I desire to say in regard to this matter. I do know, as I said a while ago, that nobody would for a moment have whispered any imputation in this Chamber as to the motives of any Senator, but I do know that all over the country outside of this Chamber the people who are opposed to any canal are all now anxiously advocating the adoption of the Panama route. They seem to think that that is an indefinite continuance of the subject, that we will at least enter upon the doldrums of legislative, financial, and diplomatic difficulty, where we shall drift about at the mercy of the varying currents, subject to indefinite and variable winds, without arriving in port at any time. I fear that. I fear complications with the Colombian Government.

I fear the complications that will come up with regard to the enormous loss of the French people. It seems to my mind absolutely impossible that this New Panama Canal Company can all at once dispossess itself of the property which it took over from the old company upon a contract to complete the canal and with a pledge to pay the robbed victims of the old management 60 per cent of the profits in this transaction. Those things are absolutely insuperable to me.

The conditions of construction are dangerous and uncertain. The construction of the canal at Panama is certain to involve an enormous loss of life.

I have here some data in regard to climatic conditions there which I shall not introduce. I believe the Senate is thoroughly convinced that the Panama line is one of the most unhealthy regions of the world. The records as to that are complete and full in every direction. It is a peculiarly fatal country. The city of Panama itself is a perpetual center of infection for yellow fever; it is a filthy town; it has not been washed for four hundred years; and if we undertake to supply that city with aqueducts and with water facilities, it will cost us millions and millions of dollars, and it will lead to all sorts of conflict on this proposition which ought never to be entertained for a moment.

I hope, Mr. President, that no man who desires to see a canal built, no man who desires to see a practical and practicable canal built, will be led off by the last recommendation of the Commission, which seems to be one based simply upon a little financial consideration, practically a bargain-counter proposition. Engineers have condemned that all over the world; and while I believe with American energy, with American skill, and with the Treasury of the United States to back them, and with unlimited time, they can make an open strait, if they desire it, across that Isthmus, yet I hope that it will not be a matter that we will relegate to future generations.

Mr. KITTREDGE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3374) to protect forest reserves, and for other purposes.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I object to any other business until the Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER] can take the floor. He desires to take the floor upon the pending bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama objects to the consideration of the bill asked for by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KITTREDGE].

Mr. CULLOM. Does the Senator from Washington desire to go on this evening?

Mr. TURNER. I have no disposition to go on this evening unless the Senate desires me to do so.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to ask the Senator from Washington to yield to me for a few moments. I want to make a statement in respect to a question asked by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. HARRIS], as it is necessary to have the matter cleared up in order to save further time hereafter. I want this bill to progress as rapidly as possible.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER] is recognized by the Chair.

Mr. TURNER. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] asked a question of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. HARRIS], at the time he was on the floor, relating to the eleventh article of the proposed convention submitted by Nicaragua for the consideration of this Government, not for adoption by this Congress, but for the consideration of the diplomatic authorities of the Government. It is this:

ARTICLE XI.

Although maintaining that upon principles of justice no valid claims of citizens of the United States exist against Nicaragua, the latter accepts the engagement of the United States to pay and to discharge Nicaragua from all liability on account of claims of citizens of the United States which may have arisen prior to the date of the signing of this convention.

Shortly after I came to the Senate, twenty-five years ago, I was put upon the committee, of which Senator Hamlin, of Maine, was chairman, called the "Nicaraguan Claims Committee," out of which originated the present Interoceanic Canal Committee. A number of claims were sent before that committee in favor of citizens of the United States against Nicaragua, and counterclaims resulting from the destruction of Greytown. These claims had originated at the time or shortly after the time that a United States vessel burned Greytown. The claims have been pending from that time on to the present date.

This Government although very often importuned by citizens of the United States to press those claims has never done so; for what reason I can not conjecture. Doubtless in the progress of the discussion of this matter those claims have been mentioned; but they have not any connection in the world with the canal. They were claims for outrages that were alleged to have been perpetrated upon our citizens passing between California and New York, one of those claims being in behalf of a merchant of some distinction and a great deal of property who was killed in Nicaragua. His daughters have been living in this town and pressing that claim from that day to this without any consideration on the part of this Government except an occasional admonition to Nicaragua that the claim ought to be settled. Nicaragua in starting out on a fresh movement with us wanted naturally to have all difficulties of that sort removed, and this article was intended to cover claims of that kind, or perhaps three or four of them, and I suppose altogether they do not amount to $500,000.

The Senator from South Carolina and many other Senators seem to suppose that Article XI was intended to cover claims in behalf or in favor of the Maritime Canal Company against Nicaragua. The impossibility of that, Mr. President, clearly appears when I state the fact that in the charter which Congress granted to the Maritime Canal Company it was expressly based upon concessions that had been made by Nicaragua and were expected to be made by Costa Rica to this Maritime Canal Company. The language of the first section of the act is:

Be it enacted, etc., That Frederick Billings, Charles P. Daly, Daniel Ammen, Francis A. Stout, Horace L. Hotchkiss, Edward F. Beale, Hiram Hitchcock, C. Ridgeley Goodwin, A. C. Cheney, J. F. O'Shaughnessy, H. C. Taylor, J. W. Miller, A. S. Crowninshield, A. G. Menocal, Charles H. Stebbins, T. Harrison Garrett, Jules Aldige, R. A. Lancaster, Alfred E. Mills, Gustav E. Kissell, Horace Fairbanks, George H. Robinson, Alfred B. Darling, Joseph E. McDonald, James Roosevelt, Christian Devries, Frederick F. Thompson, Henry A. Parr, and such other persons as may be associated with them and their successors are hereby constituted and created a body corporate and politic indeed and in law by the name, style, and title of "The Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua," for the construction, equipment, management, and operation of a ship canal from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean, either entirely through the territory of the Republic of Nicaragua or through Nicaragua and in part through the territory of the Republic of Costa Rica, with such collateral, connecting, or cross canals as may be necessary to connect therewith, and to exercise such other powers as have been conferred by the Government of Nicaragua by the concession of that Republic to the Nicaragua Canal Association, through Mr. A. G. Menocal, its representative, and dated the 23d day of March, A. D. 1887, and finally approved by the legislative and executive authority of the Republic on the 20th, 23d, and 24th days of April, A. D. 1887, and such powers as the Republic of Costa Rica may confer of the same kind as those named in said concession; and the said Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua by that name shall have perpetual succession, may sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, defend and be defended in all courts of law and equity within the United States; may make and have a common seal, and shall have and possess the rights, powers, and privileges usually possessed by similar companies.

It may receive, purchase, hold, and convey such real and personal estate, property, and rights of property, or concessionary rights as may be necessary to carry into effect the purposes of this act; may issue stock to the amount of the just value of such estate, property, and rights, and for work and labor done, or materials provided in the execution of the work of constructing said ship canal; and the stock issued for these purposes shall be deemed paid-up stock and shall not be liable to any further calls or assessments; may do all lawful things to secure the full enjoyment of the powers, privileges, rights, benefits, and grants contained in any canal concession so made by the Republic of Nicaragua, or to be made by the Republic of Costa Rica, as aforesaid; and to aid in the construction of said canal and to carry out the purposes of this act, the said Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua is hereby authorized to issue its bonds, and to secure the same by mortgage on its property and rights of property of all kinds and descriptions, real, personal, and mixed, including its franchise to be a corporation. The principal office of said corporation shall be in the city of New York, and all legal process may be served upon the person who may at the time be in charge of said office or upon the attorney of said company, whose name and address shall be certified by the president of the company; and such certificate shall be filed in the office of the Secretary of State of the United States: Provided, however, That nothing in this act contained shall be so construed as to commit the United States to any pecuniary liability whatever for or on account of said company, nor shall the United States be held in any wise liable or responsible in any form or by any implication for any debt or liability, in any form which said company may incur, nor be held as guaranteeing any engagement or contract of said company, or as having assumed, by virtue of this act, any responsibility for the acts or proceedings of said company in any foreign country, or contracts or engagements entered into in the United States

The Senate will see there that the action of Congress in chartering that company was based upon this concession, and made for the purpose of carrying that concession into effect, and upon nothing else.

In the eleventh article of that concession, which I will read, it will appear that the Government of Nicaragua and also the Government of Costa Rica were shareholders, corporators, in this company chartered by the Congress of the United States—a very novel position, but still that is the law:

ARTICLE XI.

The Government of Nicaragua in its character of shareholder in the company of execution, as hereinafter provided, shall have the perpetual right of naming one director, who shall be an integral part of the board of directors of the company, with all the rights, privileges, and advantages conferred upon them by the statutes of the company and the laws of the country under which it shall organize.

Here were two Republics coming into this corporation, the Maritime Canal Company, in virtue of this act of Congress, and also in virtue of the concession or agreement between them for constructing and operating the canal. Now, I should like to know how Nicaragua or Costa Rica as a member of that corporation can have a claim against the United States under any circumstances for any wrong that it might inflict upon its co-corporators? Suppose that Nicaragua has mistreated the balance of the incorporators or the balance of the stockholders of the Maritime Canal Company, how can that give a claim against the United States? There is no such claim in existence—there never was pretended to be, and it can not exist. So that this eleventh article has no reference whatever to any such claim.

More than that, Mr. McKinley, on the 1st day of December, 1900, entered into a contract with Nicaragua, and on the same day and in the same words entered into a contract with Costa Rica, for what?

It is agreed between the two Governments that when the President of the United States is authorized by law to acquire control of such portion of the territory now belonging to Nicaragua as may be desirable and necessary on which to construct and protect a canal of depth and capacity sufficient for the passage of vessels of the greatest tonnage and draft now in use, from a point near San Juan del Norte, on the Caribbean Sea, via Lake Nicaragua, to Brito, on the Pacific Ocean, they mutually engage to enter into negotiations with each other to settle the plan and agreements, in detail, found necessary to accomplish the construction and to provide for the ownership and control of the proposed canal.

As a preliminary to such future negotiations, it is forthwith agreed that the course of said canal and the terminals thereof shall be the same that were stated in a treaty signed by the plenipotentiaries of the United States and Great Britain on February 5, 1900, and now pending in the Senate of the United States for confirmation, and that the provisions of the same shall be adhered to by the United States and Nicaragua.

In witness whereof the undersigned have signed this protocol and have hereunto affixed their seals.

Done in duplicate, at Washington, this 1st day of December, 1900.

JOHN HAY. [SEAL.]
LUIS F. COREA. [SEAL.]

The treaty referred to there has been made on the part of Nicaragua and Costa Rica a part of this agreement by subsequent stipulations, which they have filed with the Secretary of State, and which have been reported to the Senate. Therefore the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, as it was ratified, contains the terms of this agreement, except so far as they are expressed in another part of it. That treaty was referred to merely for the purpose of showing what the terms of the agreement were. Now, what are they? That the United States shall have the exclusive right of constructing and maintaining a canal across that Isthmus between the terminal points stated here in this agreement. How could the United States acquire from Nicaragua and Costa Rica the exclusive right to construct a canal there if either Nicaragua or Costa Rica admitted that there was any outstanding claim in favor of the Maritime Canal Company? It is an impossibility. There is no such claim, and there can not be such a claim, because they have conceded to us under this agreement the exclusive right to construct, maintain, and control a canal across that Isthmus.

What does this agreement mean? I shall not go into a discussion of it. Does it mean anything? Mr. President, no wiser act was ever performed by a President of the United States than Mr. McKinley performed in having that agreement drawn up and signed. Why? Because he foresaw that the very moment we should get into discussion here, France or England—and both of them have done that very thing since that time, as I can show to the Senate—would interpose for the purpose of trying to get Nicaragua to make the concession to them; which would cut us out. So he bound those States in this contract, and said that they should stay bound until the Congress of the United States refused to grant him the power to acquire that territory. My friends on the other side of the Chamber who profess to admire Mr. McKinley so much, and none of them admire him personally more than I do, or was fonder of him than I was, or had more confidence in him than I had, those gentlemen will understand when they look over this contract that William McKinley was not playing at pushpin in making it, but he was carrying out the most magnificent part of the whole of the diplomatic action that has taken place in regard to this canal.

Now, he has bound these Governments, and they claim that they are bound and that we are bound, to do what? To consider the agreement and also to authorize the President to acquire these rights, or if not, to release them. How can we hold them perpetually? Congress has the right, and has exercised it with the largest liberty, to postpone the consideration of this agreement of December, 1900, and here it is hanging in the air now, and Nicaragua and Costa Rica both pressing for consideration.

The moment we refuse to accept it that moment they are free. The moment we pass a law authorizing the President of the United States to acquire the lands mentioned therein—the "territory," it is called—for the exclusive purpose of erecting and controlling and managing a canal, that moment they are bound.

Now, sir, I wanted to put that in a clear light before the Senate. There is no use bringing up here quips and quiddities, questions of no value. Let us do justice to the subject and to each other on this occasion.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President——

Mr. TURNER. I understand I have the floor.

Mr. CULLOM. I merely wish to make a motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will recognize the Senator from Washington when the unfinished business is taken up to-morrow.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 4071. An act granting an increase of pension to George C. Tillman; and

S. 4927. An act granting an increase of pension to Hattie M. Whitney.

JUDSON G. HOWELL.

By unanimous consent, on motion of Mr. WRIGHT, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Judson G. Howell, Fifty-sixth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may have two minutes for the purpose of making a personal explanation or statement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to have two minutes for a personal explanation. Is there objection?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, is it with respect to the pending measure?

Mr. RAY of New York. Yes; in regard to the pending measure, with reference to something said in the debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, all I care to say is that on Saturday, in the course of the five-minute debate, I asserted emphatically that there were certain provisions of the Revised Statutes of the United States providing a minimum punishment of imprisonment without naming a maximum. A gentleman who is not present, and whose name I will not therefore mention, as emphatically asserted they were not there and challenged me to produce them. Of course, I did not have the Revised Statutes before me at the time, and had no reference to my memoranda, which were in the committee room, and I could not comply at the time. I now have the sections of the Revised Statutes to which I referred, exactly as I stated them to be, and I ask leave to insert those in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the insertion will be made.

The sections referred to are as follows:

SEC. 5332, R. S. Every person guilty of treason shall suffer death, or, at the direction of the court, shall be imprisoned at hard labor for not less than five years and fined not less than $10,000, to be levied on and collected out of any or all of his property, real and personal, of which he was the owner at the time of committing such treason, any sale or conveyance to the contrary notwithstanding, and every person so convicted of treason shall, moreover, be incapable of holding any office under the United States.

SEC. 5354, R. S. When the death of any person is caused by the explosion of any quantity of such articles, or either of them, while the same is being placed upon any vessel or vehicle to be transported in violation of the preceding section, or while the same is being so transported, or while the same is being removed from such vessel or vehicle, every person who knowingly placed, or aided, or permitted the placing of such articles upon such vessel or vehicle to be so transported, is guilty of manslaughter, and shall suffer imprisonment for a period of not less than two years.

PROTECTION OF THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas demands the regular order. The regular order is the vote pending at adjournment on Saturday, upon which the yeas and nays were ordered. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri to recommit with instructions the bill with respect to the protection of the President.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 71, nays 125, answered "present" 21, not voting 134; as follows:

So the bill was passed.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to know if my vote is recorded?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has not voted. Was he present and listening when his name was called?

Mr. GLENN. I was listening to my name and did not hear it.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman listening?

Mr. GLENN. Yes, sir; I was on the second roll call. I was not present on the first roll call.

The name of Mr. GLENN was called, and he voted "no."

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, am I recorded?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not recorded.

Mr. MONDELL. I was present and listening and did not hear my name called.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman listening when his name was called?

Mr. MONDELL. I was.

The SPEAKER. And did not hear it?

Mr. MONDELL. I did not hear it.

The name of Mr. MONDELL was called, and he voted "aye."

The following additional pairs were announced:

On this vote:

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania with Mr. VANDIVER.

Mr. CORLISS with Mr. BREAZEALE.

For balance of day:

Mr. APLIN with Mr. SULZER.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the title in accordance with the recommendation of the committee.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the amendment of the title will be agreed to.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

On motion of Mr. RAY of New York, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

AMERICAN CITIZENS DETAINED IN SOUTH AFRICA.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, I submit a privileged report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois submits a privileged report, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution No. 286.

Whereas it being now reported in the public press that terms of peace have been signed and accepted by Great Britain and the late South African Republics, and that war between these peoples has ceased: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, requested, if not incompatible with the public interests, to furnish the House of Representatives with a complete list showing the names of all American citizens (and their residence) who are now detained by the British authorities as prisoners of war, together with information as to what investigation, if any, has been made by the State Department concerning the cause of their detention, and what action has been taken to secure their release.

The report (by Mr. HITT) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom was referred House resolution 286, requesting the Secretary of State to furnish to the House a complete list of American citizens now detained by the British authorities as prisoners of war, having duly considered the same, report it back with the recommendation that it be passed.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was ageed to.

HENRY I. SMITH.

Mr. RUMPLE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a conference report and statement, to be printed.

The SPEAKER. The report and statement will be printed in the RECORD.

The report of the committee of conference is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8794) granting an increase of pension to Henry I. Smith, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed by the Senate insert "forty."

J. N. W. RUMPLE,
ELIAS DEEMER,
Managers on the part of the House.

A. G. FOSTER,
J. R. BURTON,
E. W. CARMACK,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement of the House conferees is as follows:

The bill (H. R. 8794) granting an increase of pension to Henry I. Smith passed the House at $60. The Senate amended by striking out $60 and inserting $30.

The result of the conference is that the House recede from is disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows:

In lieu of the sum proposed by the Senate insert "forty."

J. N. W. RUMPLE,
ELIAS DEEMER,
Managers on the part of the House.

PERSONAL STATEMENT.

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to be allowed two minutes to make a personal statement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that he be accorded two minutes to make a personal statement. Is there objection?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. May I ask the gentleman what is the subject of his personal explanation?

Mr. MORRELL. In reference to some remarks I made on Saturday in relation to the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Speaker, I have learned that the remarks which I made in a joking manner on Saturday, while section 13 of the bill was being discussed, have been considered by some to be a reflection upon the Judiciary Committee. I beg to state that nothing was further from my intention. I have the highest respect for the chairman and members of that committee, and also for their ability and learning; and what I intended was simply to allude to the manner in which all amendments, both those that were offered on the other side and those offered on this side of the House, had been through their skill bowled over, my own two little pets among the number. If they consider what I said in any way discourteous, I offer them at this present time a full and ample apology.

LEVI HATCHETT.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill S. 2975. It has heretofore been printed in the RECORD, and I ask to have the report agreed to. I ask to dispense with the reading of the report and to read the statement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the report, and that the statement be read. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The statement was read, as follows:

The Senate bill S. 2975 increased the pension of Levi Hatchett to $24. The House amended the Senate bill by striking out "$24" and inserting "$17." The result of the conference agreement is that the House recedes, and this leaves the bill as it passed the Senate.

HENRY R. GIBSON,
RUD. KLEBERG,
Conferees on the part of the House.

Mr. GIBSON. I move the adoption of the report.

The report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

HELEN A. B. DU BARRY.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on Senate bill 1037, granting an increase of pension to Helen A. B. Du Barry. I ask that the reading of the report be omitted and that the statement be read.

The SPEAKER. Has it been printed in the RECORD?

Mr. GIBSON. It has, on page 6776 of the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee presents a conference report, and asks that the reading of the report be omitted and the statement only be read. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement, as follows:

The bill (S. 1037) granting an increase of pension to Helen A. B. Du Barry passed the Senate at $50. The House amended the same by striking out "$50" and inserting "$40."

The result of the conference is that the House recedes from its amendment, leaving the bill as it passed the Senate.

C. A. SULLOWAY,
HENRY R. GIBSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

The conference report was agreed to.

GEORGE W. BARRY.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, I send up a conference report on the bill (H. R. 9544) granting an increase of pension to George W. Barry for the purpose of printing it in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee presents conference report on House bill 9544, to be printed in the RECORD under the rule.

[For conference report see Senate proceedings of June 6, 1902.]

The statement is as follows:

The bill (H. R. 9644) granting an increase of pension to George W. Barry passed the House at $20. The Senate amended the same by striking out "$20" and inserting "$16."

The result of the conference is that the House recedes from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate and agrees to the same, leaving the bill as it passed the Senate.

C. A. SULLOWAY,
HENRY R. GIBSON,
RUDOLPH KLEBERG,
Managers on the part of the House.

TRANSFER OF FOREST RESERVES.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is House bill 11536, in relation to forest reserves.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the House bill (H. R. 11536) to transfer certain forest reserves to the control of the Department of Agriculture, to authorize game and fish protection in forest reserves, and for other purposes.

Mr. Speaker, the order is not properly printed on the face of the Calendar. That was amended in the House by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. In what respect?

Mr. LACEY. For the House to resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill instead of being considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. It was done at the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

The SPEAKER. That is in accordance with the recollection of the Chair. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union as by the order of the House some days ago.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. OLMSTED in the chair.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, without making any preliminary arrangement in regard to time for general debate, I think probably the best way to treat this bill would be to have a general debate not very long extended, but a full allowance of time under the five-minute rule, so that the bill can be more carefully considered in its details and not so much time spent in general debate. I make these suggestions, but I would like to hear from any gentleman inclined to oppose the bill.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does not the gentleman think that the best way would be for the gentleman to open the case on his side, and then have one on the other side, and then begin to read the bill? Or, if it is to be understood that we are not to be cut off under the five-minute rule, but shall have ten or fifteen minutes, I am willing to take up the bill now.

Mr. LACEY. Of course, an agreement of this kind would not be binding in each and every instance, but where the House has entered into an arrangement of this kind to perfect a bill in detail like this it has worked satisfactorily, and I have no doubt it can be done in the present instance.

Mr. Chairman, I will endeavor to explain the merits of the bill. This bill was introduced to carry out the purposes set out in the President's annual message to Congress last December, and I will ask in a preliminary way that the Clerk will read that portion of the President's message.

The Clerk read as follows:

Certain of the forest reserves should also be made preserves for the wild forest creatures. All of the reserves should be better protected from fires. Many of them need special protection because of the great injury done by live stock, above all by sheep. The increase in deer, elk, and other animals in the Yellowstone Park shows what may be expected when other mountain forests are properly protected by law and properly guarded. Some of these areas have been so denuded of surface vegetation by overgrazing that the ground-breeding birds, including grouse and quail, and many mammals, including deer, have been exterminated or driven away. At the same time the water-storing capacity of the surface has been decreased or destroyed, thus promoting floods in time of rain and diminishing the flow of streams between rains.

In cases where natural conditions have been restored for a few years, vegetation has again carpeted the ground. birds and deer are coming back, and hundreds of persons, especially from the immediate neighborhood, come each summer to enjoy the privilege of camping. Some at least of the forest reserves should afford perpetual protection to the native fauna and flora, safe havens of refuge to our rapidly diminishing wild animals of the larger kinds, and free camping grounds for the ever increasing numbers of men and women who have learned to find rest, health, and recreation in the splendid forests and flower-clad meadows of our mountains. The forest reserves should be set apart forever for the use and benefit of our people as a whole and not sacrificed to the shortsighted greed of a few.

The forests are natural reservoirs. By restraining the streams in flood and replenishing them in drought they make possible the use of waters otherwise wasted. They prevent the soil from washing, and so protect the storage reservoirs from filling up with silt. Forest conservation is therefore an essential condition of water conservation.

* * * * * * *

At present the protection of the forest reserves rests with the General Land Office, the mapping and description of their timber with the United States Geological Survey, and the preparation of plans for their conservative use with the Bureau of Forestry, which is also charged with the general advancement of practical forestry in the United States. These various functions should be united in the Bureau of Forestry, to which they properly belong. The present diffusion of responsibility is bad from every standpoint It prevents that effective cooperation between the Government and the men who utilize the resources of the reserves, without which the interests of both must suffer. The scientific bureaus generally should be put under the Department of Agriculture. The President should have by law the power of transferring lands for use as forest reserves to the Department of Agriculture. He already has such power in the case of lands needed by the Departments of War and the Navy.

Mr. LACEY. Now, the question of a system of forest reserves in this country is of comparatively recent origin, and interest in it has become general. There are two propositions involved in this bill. The first is that the reserves which have heretofore been created and which may hereafter be set apart shall be transferred from time to time for administration to the Department of Agriculture. The bill however provides that this shall not be done until the permanent boundaries of each of these reservations shall be established, which permanent delimitation of the boundaries shall precede the transfer of each reserve. In the end the result will be that all of the forest reserves will be transferred to the Department of Agriculture for administration. We have now a Bureau of Forestry in the Department of Agriculture. That Bureau has in its employ practically all the scientific foresters in the United States. We have a Division of Forestry in the Land Office, but the Land Office, of course, has not been specially fitted for this scientific work. The great purpose of the Land Office has been to survey and dispose of the public lands, not to take care and preserve them, but to dispose of them to private individuals. So that by the very nature of the organization of the two departments, the permanent administration and permanent care of the forests would more properly be lodged in the Department of Agriculture.

In other words, forestry is tree cultivation upon a large scale and covering long periods of time, for which the life of an individual would be inadequate. France and Germany have been compelled by force of necessity to adopt a forestry system. Spain, too, suffering from drought and the destruction of her water courses, has adopted such a system. The State of New York has been compelled to buy the Adirondacks, spending $4,000,000 in order to save the headwaters of the Hudson. These forests upon the tops of the mountains in the Far West serve to protect the snow and fountain heads of the streams and to make irrigation practical and practicable. We have upon the Calendar, and will no doubt within a few days consider, a bill with reference to the irrigation of arid lands in the West. Now, it makes no difference whether the future irrigation shall be controlled by private parties or by the States or by the United States—whichever course is taken it is essential that the sources of the streams should be preserved.

The Department of Agriculture has a scientific bureau that has been organized, not for the purpose of preventing the use of the trees on our public lands, but to provide for their use so that they may be cut down from time to time as they may be needed by settlers; and at the same time proper measures will be used to prevent fires and to maintain and restore these forests, as in Germany they are maintaining and preserving these forests, while at the same time they are realizing from year to year the benefits of marketing the ripened or matured trees.

In France they have found that by the destruction of the forests the heavy rains have resulted in washing down the soil on the sides of the mountains and destroying the valleys beneath, and at an expense of millions of francs the French Government is restoring the forests on the mountain slopes. The people of the United States have wakened up to the necessity of preserving at least a portion of our woods, to the end that the balance of our land may be successfully tilled.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does this bill extend the law as it now exists with reference to these forest reserves? Does it make any change?

Mr. LACEY. There is no change whatever, except that from time to time, as the boundaries of these reserves shall have been finally settled, the reserves may, in the discretion of the President, be transferred from the management of the Department of the Interior to the Department of Agriculture.

There is a reason for not doing this all at once. The President manifested his desire for an immediate transfer. This would not be practicable for this reason: The boundaries of some of these reserves were very imprudently established. Territory is included in some of them that ought not to be included. Under the law in pursuance of which they were created there was authority to add from time to time additional area for these reservations, but no provision was made by which any of the reserves could be afterwards excluded from these boundaries without a special act of Congress.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Does this bill provide any means of decreasing or lessening the reserves?

Mr. LACEY. I will explain that in a moment.

That being the case, there was much dissatisfaction over the sudden establishment of very large areas of reserves, and an amendment was put into an appropriation bill by which power was given to the President to issue at any time an Executive order excluding portions of these reserves and providing also for a method of surveying by which the Geological Survey could establish the permanent boundaries and thus separate from the various reservations, without further Congressional action, such portions as were found to be improvidently or unnecessarily included in the original boundaries of the reserves as established.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does the bill make any change with reference to the leasing of these lands for grazing purposes to cattlemen or sheepmen?

Mr. LACEY. It does not attempt to deal with that question.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will that be permitted under the law if this bill be passed?

Mr. LACEY. The law is not changed in that respect. The facilities for the grazing of sheep, cattle, and other domestic animals within the various reserves are not interfered with. The permits, however, for that purpose are limited, of course, to the capacity of the reserves. The endeavor is made not to overstock them—not to put in so many cattle that they must feed upon the herbage of the young trees, and thus destroy instead of increasing the forests. That is the requirement of the existing law, and this bill does not attempt to deal with that question in any way.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The object of the present law and of this bill, as I understand, is to preserve the forests.

Mr. LACEY. That purpose is the same in both measures.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The gentleman is no doubt aware of the fact that many of these forest reserves embrace lands where, over a great many square miles, there is not a stick of timber.

Mr. LACEY. I have stated that in a great many instances lands have been improvidently included in these reserves. I think, however, that if a bill should be passed at once transferring all the reserves, without having the boundaries surveyed, there might be trouble in afterwards making the necessary corrections.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I appreciate that fact.

Mr. LACEY. That ought to be done prior to the permanent transfer of any reserves to the Agricultural Department. Power is to be conferred upon the President to exclude from the operation of this bill the lands which may be more useful for other purposes. For instance, there may be mineral discoveries in a reserve not now known to contain any such deposits. Towns may speedily grow up in the vicinity, rendering it necessary, or at least very proper, that additional territory should be excluded. That power in the Executive, as it now exists, is not in any way affected by the provisions of this bill.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. LACEY. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is it not a fact that the miners can now go upon these timber lands anywhere and locate their claims?

Mr. LACEY. They can.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. And they are permitted to use the timber on them?

Mr. LACEY. The effort has been made to meet the sentiment of the communities where the reserves are located, not to use them to the detriment of the community, but to make them subserve the necessities, the uses, and the growth of the communities in which they are located.

It is the purpose of the Government, as evidenced by its former action, to select these reserves from land that is not suitable for farming. Mr. Chairman, the proposition is to permit the setting apart of game and fish preserves in such portions of these various forest reserves as may be found suitable for that purpose, with the proviso, however, that where any such reserve is in a State it can not be set apart for this purpose until the executive of the State shall have first consented to that order, thus securing the united action of the State and of the National Government in creating such reserve.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. LACEY. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The gentleman says that the provisions in this bill which provide that the consent of the governor shall be obtained before certain very important steps are taken, secures the cooperation of the United States with the State government; and I want to ask him if he regards that as a sufficient safeguarding of the rights of the people, when the governor himself is authorized to give this consent, or to petition for the benefits offered?

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, I think where you first require that the President of the United States shall act, and, second, that he shall only act with the consent of the executive of the State, that that will be an ample safeguard, because no governor representing the people of his State will ask or consent to the establishment of such a preserve in a locality where it is undesirable, or in a community that is hostile to such reservation; and in this way we will have the concerted action of both executives, and thus not force upon any unwilling State the benefits of such reserves. In short, I think instead of creating reserves, and having friction afterwards, these reserves will be asked for in reasonable limit in the various States in which forest reserves are situated.

Take a State like Colorado, with several forest reserves, and suppose the governor of Colorado shall ask the Executive of the United States to set apart one-half of one of those reserves or all of some one of them for a game preserve in order that the elk and the antelope and the fish, the various species of the forest and of the stream, may be preserved? Now, the fish and game will overflow from these places of refuge into the outside country, and the people of the State will thus have the opportunity of hunting and fishing outside of the reservation, because by proper methods they are protected on the reservation, so that such a game preserve, while apparently interfering with the hunting of a State, will in fact increase it, because it will give in certain localities in which the birds and game live an opportunity to breed, and for that reason I have no doubt that the request will be made from every State in which there are forest reserves to have at least a portion of some one of these reservations thus set apart. This provision was not put in as to Territories. The governor of a Territory is appointed by the President of the United States and owes his office to him.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. But, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. LACEY. And the provision was applied to the States alone for that reason.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The gentleman does not meet the proposition. The bill in its provisions provides a changing of the system of the administration of public justice, authorizing a punishment for the violation of regulations of an officer of the United States Government.

Mr. LACEY. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Changing in that respect the making of and providing for the prosecution of crime within the boundaries of a State.

Mr. LACEY. Creating a Federal crime, in short, where there is only a State offense now.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Now, while the opinion of the gentleman with reference to the solicitude of the governors for these things may be germane, it is more important that the people of those States shall be consulted, and that their legislative voice shall be heard; otherwise it gives to him an arbitrary power, and he is irresponsible to the people, already elected as he is, and therefore——

Mr. LACEY. The legislature would be equally irresponsible to the people after they get their office. If you say that a man after election ceases to be responsible to the people who elected him, I think you would find the governor would be just as desirous of trying to carry out the wishes of the people as any legislature would be.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. But the governor may act on the instant, whereas the legislative branch of the Government can not act until the measure comes before them in some orderly way or other, so that the people may understand what is going on and hold responsible a dereliction of duty. So it is not the opinion of the people of the State of Indiana that is expressed by their governor, he is elected for four years and is not thereafter eligible. I think it is a most dangerous power to change a branch of the criminal system of a State, simply because it is asked for by the governor of the State.

Mr. LACEY. I think the gentleman from Indiana does not gather the full scope and effect of this provision. The opinion of the Attorney-General is set out in the report, and to that I ask his attention.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Yes; but I have read the sections of the bill.

Mr. LACEY. I invite the gentleman's attention to the powers of Congress. Congress has the power, without asking the consent of anybody, to create a game preserve upon the public lands, whether they are inside a forest reserve or not; but, in my judgment, this ought not to be done without the consent of the community. There should always be full respect given to the wishes of committees, and only such arrangements of this kind made as will meet the views of the various people living in the States where the law is to be enforced.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. If the gentleman will pardon me, section 9 is the section admitting the authority of the State, which the gentleman seeks to curb:

SEC. 9. That if any offense under State or Territorial laws shall be committed within the limits of any forest reserve or fish and game preserve, other than the offenses prescribed in departmental regulations or laws of the United States, the jurisdiction of the State or Territorial courts over the same shall be in no wise impaired by this act.

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Chairman, I should like to interrupt my friend.

Mr. LACEY. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. KLEBERG. I ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that the Government of the United States has the exclusive jurisdiction over all property of arsenals, forts, public buildings, and whether it should not have exclusive jurisdiction, if necessary, in forest reservations, which are exclusively the property of the United States? I wish to suggest that there is no innovation upon any law or any practice.

Mr. LACEY. No; the Constitution expressly reserves to the Government of the United States control over the territory and property of the United States; and the word "territory" was put into the Constitution at a time when there was no such thing as "a Territory." Therefore the word "territory" as there used means the lands of the United States; and the Attorney-General, in a very able opinion, which has been set out in this report and which I will print, and which opinion was the basis upon which these features of the bill were drafted, holds that Congress has that power.

Now, in my judgment, we should not exercise that power unless there is such a demand for and such a consent to its exercise as will justify and require the governor, representing the people of the whole State, to say he thinks it ought to be done. And in that way, instead of administering this feature of the bill in opposition to local sentiment, we would go hand in hand with the local desires and aid the State authorities in carrying out a purpose which is highly beneficial to all the inhabitants of the State.

And now as to the amenability of the governor of a State to public sentiment, as compared with the legislature, I think he is much more amenable for this reason: He must take the responsibility alone. The larger the body the more divided the responsibility, and the governor will in no instance ask that this be done unless there is an actual demand for it. He will in no instance consent that it be done if there is serious hostility in the community to having it done. I believe the two governments, State and National, will thus go hand in hand and perform a duty which will be of great benefit to the entire people in each State in which these reserves are created.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I notice section 5 makes this provision:

SEC. 5. That if any person commits or attempts to commit, in the presence of any forest officer, special agent, ranger, or custodian of any forest reserve, any act in violation of any Federal law or departmental regulation concerning forest reserves or game or fish protection thereon, such officer may, without process in hand, arrest such person at the time of such commission or attempt or in hot pursuit thereafter, and the person so arrested shall be taken before the most convenient United States court or commissioner within the district for trial or commitment.

Limiting it to the jurisdiction of the United States in this matter. Is that the purpose of the gentleman?

Mr. LACEY. As to departmental regulations and as to Federal laws, certainly; as to State laws, certainly not. A departmental regulation is made to prevent the setting out of fire, and we send men there to keep the fire from being set out.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. What protection do you give in a State by State authority?

Mr. LACEY. There is the custodian to see that the fire is not set out, and he would arrest anybody actually found violating the Federal law.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. And if you arrest him anywhere you carry him before a United States court?

Mr. LACEY. There is no other place to take him.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Would it not be well to reserve the right to try him in a State court?

Mr. LACEY. Yes; in pursuance of State laws. In some of the States we have a close season for certain animals and birds for five years. Now, under the State law, no difference where one of these animals is killed, it is a violation of the State law whether they are killed upon the public lands, forest reserves, or upon private lands, and the State law would be enforced as against that crime. Again, in a similar way as to States, a bird is taken upon a reservation, and in the reservation there are certain animals protected under this regulation, we will say, for five years, that are not protected by the State law. They are protected by a Government regulation, formulated by authority of law, upon the public lands of the United States; nor can these regulations be enforced in the State courts, because the State courts would have no jurisdiction.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If the gentleman will pardon me. Take it in the case of the Territories. That would apply on reservations, say, that were 250 miles to the nearest Federal court, and the man who is simply in hot pursuit is arrested by United States marshal, who must transport him some 200 miles for a mere misdemeanor, at an enormous expense to the Government in the prosecution. Now, it seems to me that is unnecessary in this bill. Why not give to an adjacent or some nearer court jurisdiction over this question of a mere misdemeanor or an attempt? Do you not think in this case the jurisdiction ought to be placed somewhere near?

Mr. LACEY. I think so, undoubtedly, in the Territories, because all the Territorial courts are Federal courts.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. No; they have decided that differently.

Mr. LACEY. They are Federal courts, I think, within the meaning of this bill. When we reach this section of the bill under the five-minute rule I would be glad if my friend would suggest some amendment that would cover this question as to the Territories, so that there may be no doubt about it.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. That the Federal and Territorial courts have jurisdiction?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The point I am trying to make is that but a few courts have Federal jurisdiction and that in certain named places—for instance, two places in the Territory—and the Territorial courts have jurisdiction in every county.

Mr. LACEY. I catch the gentleman's point, and when we come to section 5 of this bill I see where there may be trouble of that kind which can be very easily remedied as to the Territories. So far as the States are concerned, it would not need to be done. There would be no need of that, because the distances there are not often so great as in the Territories.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I understand under the provisions of this bill there would be offenses that would be described and punished under the Federal law?

Mr. LACEY. Undoubtedly.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. And there would be a separate class of offenses described and punished under regulations by Federal officers?

Mr. LACEY. Well, the regulations have the form and effect of law.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. One made by a Federal officer and another sanctioned by the legislative branch of the Government; and a third class would be the offenses punishable under the State law. What provision does the bill contain as to a conflict of jurisdiction, or as to a conviction of one being a bar to his conviction under the other?

Mr. LACEY. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Indiana that he will see the necessity of giving considerable latitude to regulations. Arizona is a warm country. The winters are short and the summers are long; and so with New Mexico. In Montana and Idaho we have the opposite conditions. Regulations which are necessary for the carrying out of this law in the one State or Territory would be quite inapplicable in another. The close seasons would be quite different. Suppose you wanted to protect the fish in Idaho, in the trout streams there. Suppose we want to prevent fishing with dynamite and prohibit various other irregular and unlawful fishing in the waters of these forest reserves. Suppose we want to make a short open season. Now, in Arizona, with their climate, in a different latitude, the regulations that would fit Idaho would be wholly unadapted to Arizona, and therefore the control of these reserves for the use of the people of the States and Territories, and for the benefit of the whole community, would have to be somewhat different in one locality from what it is in another. There must therefore be considerable latitude given for such regulations.

In some localities, for instance, certain animals do not need protection; the mountains and the forests are so situated that they can take care of themselves. In other localities they have been hunted so fiercely that the protection should be more extended.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The gentleman would clothe the Federal officer with the power of making one regulation for one State and another for another, the violation of which would subject him to a penalty?

Mr. LACEY. Within the limits of the Government property only. This is not an experiment. We have precisely that state of things in the forest reserves to-day, and without it we could not have forest reserves at all. There must be departmental regulations to protect such reserves. Without this power it would be impossible to make these forest reserves available for the use of the community.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. If you punish a violator under the State authorities, can you also punish him under the regulations by the Federal authority?

Mr. LACEY. Well, we have just spent three days in the debate on the anti-anarchy bill as to the powers of the State on the one hand and the Federal Government on the other, and I must refer my friend to that discussion. I have my opinion about it; indeed, I have no doubt about it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I might suggest to the gentleman that the statesmen sometimes do not seem to regard the right of the States, and the right to prosecute their own offenses and pass laws according to their own notions seem to be overlooked, and we are asked to go so far as to clothe United States officers with the power of making one regulation for one reserve and another for another.

Mr. LACEY. I have never been a "State's rights man," but I have nevertheless always had the highest regard for the rights of the States. In the drafting of this bill I have endeavored to so prepare its limits as to always have due regard for the wishes as well as the rights of the State, that no steps like those now proposed should be taken by the Government as to its own property under the constitutional rights reserved to it without first asking for the consent of that State through its governor. It is not necessary, but I think it prudent to ask such consent.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as to the necessity of a law of this kind. Our ancestors were all killers. Prehistoric man with his club and his stone weapons no doubt exterminated the mammoth. If these cruel forefathers of ours had owned breech-loaders the progenitors of the horse, the cow, the sheep, and the ox would have disappeared from the earth long before domestication. The boy of to-day is as bloody-minded as his naked forefather, and begins to slay the birds and beasts as soon as he can hold a stone in his chubby hands.

From the days of the troglodyte the unequal contest has raged. Stone, bronze, iron, hawking, and gunpowder were added to man's power to destroy. But now, with the breech-loader and later improved weapons, man has become omnidestructive. He goes 500 miles for a day's shooting or half way around the world for a brief hunting and fishing trip.

The immensity of man's power to slay imposes great responsibilities.

We are threatened with the probable extinction of many varieties of birds and beasts. A birdless world would be a dreary place to live in and a birdless air would be unfit to breathe.

The wild pigeon has gone to join the great auk and the dodo in the realm of obliteration.

We may well pause and consider the situation with which we are confronted.

I read the other day of a hunt in the South where two prominent gentlemen from New York killed 1,600 ducks in two days, and generously gave them away to show that they were not mere ordinary pot hunters.

These sanguinary sportsmen should have rather hired out or volunteered to stick pigs for two days for the meat packers, where they might have glutted their appetite for gore in a more creditable way. The reckless, improvident, and indiscriminate slaughter of our fish in the rivers and the seas are only illustrations of that large waste of our natural resources that is going on in all directions. The natural gas was once worshiped as something supernatural. Now it is used for the most practical of all purposes. It has been recklessly wasted as though it had been infinite in quantity, and the depleted fields show the results of our extravagance.

Oil and forests have been extravagantly exploited in the same way.

Take the State of Texas, where a few months ago we were having many "gushers," supplying oil each at the rate of 70,000 barrels a day, but now, the newspapers tell us, the oil has ceased to flow. But experience shows that all these resources are limited.

Oil in Texas may long be pumped, but vast as the supply is it is exhaustible.

Since I have been in public life I have devoted some part of my time to the subject of the conservation and restoration of our natural resources. This question naturally arises in connection with our public domain.

It is a shocking thing to see the people of the Pacific coast wantonly engaged in making their opulent salmon streams as desolate and barren as the once prolific Connecticut now is.

Mankind must conserve the resources of nature.

When our people were cutting one another's throats during the war of 1861 to 1865 game in the South became abundant, for men had ceased to hunt anything but human kind, but when peace came the war against the creatures of the field and forest was again renewed and waged with unremitting zeal.

It is no credit to mankind that animal life is more abundant to-day around the inaccessible poles than anywhere else upon the planet.

Fish in the inhospitable Hudson Bay region are so plentiful that they could not furnish names for them all, and, like the statue to the unknown god at Athens, one of these Canadian fishes was called the "inconnu" or the "unknown" fish.

The proposed railway to Hudsons Bay will change all this. The slaughter will grow furious when "civilization" invades this breeding ground of the Far North.

Some one must in these days teach the science of how not to kill.

There are 46,000,000 acres of our forests now preserved to keep up the supply of water for our rivers. This a great step in the direction of husbanding nature's resources.

Farseeing and practical men saw that a part of the forests must be saved or the remainder of the land would become a desert, and the forest reserves were established against the protests of the unthinking.

A few of the primeval woods remain as reminders of the past. A Hibernian friend, a genial ex-Congressman from New York, once defined a virgin forest as "a place where the hand of man has never yet set his foot." This incident shows that the Irish bull, at least, is not yet extinct. [Laughter.]

Our forestry laws have enabled us to save some of these wholesome and delightful retreats.

These woods, thus set apart as the sources of water supply, may be made the city of refuge for the feeble remnant of the mighty throng of animal life that once filled this continent.

We have seen the buffalo so nearly exterminated that only about 500 living specimens to-day may be found in the whole world.

Their domestication was as practicable as that of the reindeer, the horse, or the cow.

The buffalo was the noblest of all the wild animals that inhabited this continent when America was discovered.

The ages in which this wonderful creature was evolved into his peculiar form and size are inconceivable in duration. How admirably he was adapted to life upon the western plains. When he had fed he traveled with his fellows in long lines, single file, to the favorite watering place. The herd did not spread abroad and trample down and destroy the grass in such a journey, but in long and narrow trails the journey was made, and when the drinking place was reached and thirst was sated the buffalo never defiled the pool in which he drank.

He was a gentleman among beasts, just as the game hog is a beast among gentlemen.

Perhaps out of these scanty remains new herds may again be produced.

We have preserved the wild turkey, which Benjamin Franklin proposed should be adopted instead of the American eagle as our national emblem.

The turkey has been saved; the buffalo ought also to have been domesticated. A few of the buffalos still remain. This bill makes provision by which they may have the opportunity of propagating them within a portion of the forest reserves.

Public sentiment is growing in favor of the conservation of our resources. It is timely as to some things. It is far too late as to others.

Mr. Chairman, there are these two propositions involved in this bill: First, to allow the Bureau of Forestry in the Department of Agriculture to take charge of that extended farming of the forests which only the Government can manage; second, that in a moderate degree, and within the desires of the people of the locality in which the forests are located, game and fish preserves may be established for the benefit of the surrounding country.

With this explanation, unless some other gentleman wishes to interrogate me, I will reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. ESCH. Before the gentleman takes his seat I would be glad to have him direct his attention to what I conceive to be one of the chief objections to the bill, a possible duplication of work. I am in sympathy with the purpose of the measure; but I should like to be informed whether the gentleman thinks there would be such a duplication of work in the Agricultural and Interior departments as to render the measure impracticable.

Mr. LACEY. The object of this bill is finally to prevent the duplication of work. There is to-day a complete duplication provided by law. The forest work of the Government is now distributed among three unrelated organizations: First, the Geological Survey; second, the Department of the Interior; third, the Department of Agriculture. The effect of this bill ultimately would be to transfer each reserve, as soon as its boundaries are established by the Geological Survey, to the Department of Agriculture, to be controlled, managed, and administered by that great Department.

Let me call the attention of my friend from Wisconsin to this situation. The Department of the Interior is the most overworked Department of this Government. The greatest man that the political party in power may have in its entire ranks, outside of the President himself, should be selected for the head of the Department of the Interior. The Secretary of the Interior decides more important questions involving private rights in value every year than the Supreme Court of the United States does in ten years. He has charge of patents, pensions, the census, lands, Indian affairs, and anything else that happens to be unassigned. The Department is overworked, and no difference how great the man may be who is filling the duties of that office he must of necessity be an overburdened man.

Mr. ESCH. I agree with the gentleman there.

Mr. CLARK. What is it that you are trying to do? Transfer it to the Agricultural Department?

Mr. LACEY. As fast as possible to transfer those reserves whose boundaries are thus established to the Department of Agriculture, to be administered by its Bureau of Forestry, which has been in existence for many years.

Mr. CLARK. Why does not the gentleman wait until they get up this new Department of Commerce and transfer it to that? It will not have any legitimate functions to perform.

Mr. LACEY. I will not discuss the Department of Commerce, but certainly the business of forestry—"tree farming," in other words—would not be a proper subject for the Department of Commerce.

Mr. SHAFROTH. If the Department of the Interior is so much overworked, why would it not be better to transfer the care and supervision of the forests, not only those that are contained within the reserves, but also forests that are similarly situated—in fact, all of the forest lands in the United States; or why would it not also be well to take from the Interior Department the entire land department and transfer it to the Secretary of Agriculture?

Mr. LACEY. I think I can answer that very easily. If my friend had two farms out in Colorado, one of which he wanted to have farmed and the other of which he wanted to have sold, he would select one kind of an agent to sell his farm and quite a different sort of man to manage the farm to be retained. The Department of the Interior and the Land Office, from time out of mind, have been organized for the purpose of selling, disposing, getting rid of our public domain, giving it away to homesteaders, disposing of it to preemptors, donating it under timber-culture laws, selling it under timber and stone laws—in short, disposing of it and passing it over to private ownership. The Department of Agriculture is a new Department, engaged in tree culture, in experimental farming of all kinds, giving scientific attention to all matters of interest to agriculture. Therefore we have this office that by its very organization is adapted to the care, the preservation, and the administration, as contrasted with a department that has control of the sale of public lands. I would not go to the extent of transferring the entire Land Department, but simply transfer that land which has become finally settled as a permanent part of our forestry system, and to transfer that for administration to a department that has nothing at all to do with the sale of the land itself, and for that reason I think that the distinction should still be drawn.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does not the gentleman recognize that there will continually arise, even after transfer to the Agricultural Department, question after question, even to those reservations that are transferred, which will have to be determined by the Interior Department, the question of trespass, both upon reserved and upon the public land, the question of the rights of mineral claimants, both in the reservation and out of the reservation, any number of questions that are bound to arise; and would it not be economy to the Government if this Forest Bureau in the Agricultural Department was either transferred to the Interior Department or that the Land Department of the Interier should be transferred to the Agricultural?

Mr. LACEY. That would involve a very radical departure from our entire system. The present bill only transfers the surveyed reserves to the Bureau of Forestry, which is already organized and which has appropriations and which includes within it practically all the scientific foresters of the United States. In fact, the various States, where engaged in forestry, do not call upon the Interior Department in its division of forestry for information and for aid, but rather upon the Secretary of Agriculture; and the Interior Department has lately had detailed into the division of forestry of that Department one of the skilled men from the Department of Agriculture in order to aid it in carrying out its portion of the work. The work has not been satisfactory in the Interior Department, for the reasons which I have endeavored to make plain to this House, because that Department is so overburdened as to make it impossible for it to take this additional labor and care for the future of these forests as a permanent part of our administration and at the same time perform its other work.

Mr. SCOTT. With the gentleman's permission, I want to ask if the purpose of his bill is not simply to transfer the administration and control of these reserves to the Forestry Bureau, and if, after the passage of this bill, provided it should pass, all questions of title relating to the land upon which these forests grow would not yet remain under the disposition and control of the Department of the Interior as now?

Mr. LACEY. The gentleman conceives the full scope and purpose of the bill. That is the exact idea of the bill—that these questions and controversies as to private titles and matters of that kind shall still be settled in the Land Department, where they are to-day; but the administration of the reserve itself will be with the Department of Agriculture finally in all these reserves.

Mr. HILL. That is just the point I should like to ask a question about. If this bill passes will not the Department of Agriculture be absolutely controlled by the governor of the State in which the reserve is located?

Mr. LACEY. Not at all.

Mr. HILL. Why not, under the language of this proviso?

Mr. LACEY. Only this far: If it is desired by the President of the United States to change a forest reserve into a game reserve the consent of the governor of the State must be first had as to this enlarged purpose.

Mr. HILL. Not at all, according to the proviso. The proviso reads:

That hereafter no forest reserve in any State shall be created, enlarged, or extended without the approval or written request of the governor of such State, made prior to the creation, enlargement, or extension thereof.

Mr. LACEY. That is an amendment of which I personally do not fully approve. I am not discussing that, because when we get to it under the five-minute rule we can consider that.

Mr. HILL. I was simply asking for information.

Mr. LACEY. When we get to that proposition, as to the creating of forest reserves——

Mr. HILL. Under the provisions of this bill does it not practically come down to this, that we are legislating to give the governors of the States control of the Government land within the States, so far as the forest reserves are concerned?

Mr. LACEY. Not at all.

Mr. HILL. Then I do not understand the language of the bill.

Mr. LACEY. The gentleman has the same difficulty that I have sometimes in understanding bills which come from other committees.

Mr. HILL. I have not the slightest doubt about that.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. In connection with the inquiry made by the gentleman from Kansas, is it not true that the Department of Agriculture is to-day organized to do this work?

Mr. LACEY. Perfectly so,

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. With a more competent corps of foresters.

Mr. LACEY. After the forest reserve is created the control is entirely with the Department of Agriculture, if the boundaries have been finally and definitely located; or if not, it is with the Department of the Interior until these boundaries shall have been fully established; but the consent of the governor shall first be had before we enlarge the scope of any particular reserve to include game preservation as well, and with the amendment to which the gentleman refers it provides that hereafter they can not be enlarged or created without the consent of the governor of the State. That is a different proposition and one that I personally approve.

Mr. HILL. I do not wish to misunderstand the gentleman and I do not want him to misunderstand me. The language is as follows:

And also provided, That hereafter no forest reserve in any State shall be created, enlarged, or extended without the approval or written request of the governor of such State, made prior to the creation, enlargement, or extension thereof.

Mr. LACEY. That is so plain, I think, that there can be no misunderstanding about that.

Mr. HILL. That provides for putting a check upon this legislation, and making it entirely subject to the direction of the governor of the State.

Mr. LACEY. Not at all. Let me explain to my friend.

Mr. HILL. And then you come to the second part.

Mr. LACEY. Let us dispose of this first.

Mr. HILL. That is, after the first part, then comes in this language:

Provided, That no forest reserve, or part thereof, shall be so set apart as a game and fish preserve within any State unless the governor of such State shall, in writing, request the President to issue such order.

Now, it seems to me in Federal legislation to transfer these reservations to the Agricultural Department you have practically made provision to transfer the control to the governors of the respective States.

Mr. LACEY. Not in that sense of the word. Now, in reply to my friend, I ask his attention while I explain it. In the first place——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time may be extended so that he may conclude his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Iowa may conclude his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman. I have already concluded my remarks, except to answer questions, and will only consume such additional time as may be necessary to do that. I would like to answer my friend, because it is a question that should be answered. We have 46,000,000 acres of forest reserves created under existing laws, created without the consent of any governor. Now the power of the Government in these reservations is limited only by the Constitution.

Attorney-General Knox, one of the clearest-headed lawyers that has ever administered the Department of Justice, has recently considered the subjects of the national power over the public lands and forest reserves, and his opinion is to the effect that Congress can, even within the limits of a State, legislate and make regulations by which animal life may be protected in the people's forests. This opinion of the Attorney-General will be a landmark in the history of protective legislation, for as Congress is given the power, it should not and will not fail to exercise it. I will print it in the RECORD.

As stated in the opinion of the Attorney-General, we need not ask the governor or any legislature of any State what we will do in those reservations. But we make a concession here. We give the President power to enlarge the existing purposes of these reservations, so as to make some of them fish and game preserves as well, but not to do this unless the governor of the State shall consent. After that consent has been given this control of the National Government will be exercised, but not until then. When the gentleman stated that we were turning over the control to the governor of a State, he does not comprehend the scope of the bill, or perhaps has been unfortunate in his expression.

Now let me answer the other part of the gentleman's question, because it was a dual question. Under existing laws the President of the United States can take any public forest land in the United States and create a forest reserve out of it. The majority of the Committee on Public Lands, recognizing the fact that some of these boundaries had been very unsatisfactory, and that friction had thereby arisen in some of the States in regard to forest boundaries, have suggested the propriety of placing the same limitation as to the creation of reserves hereafter upon the President, so that in making future additions to the existing 46,000,000 acres the consent of the governor of the State in which the reservation was located must be given; but the reserve, would not be under the control of the governor.

Mr. HILL. In the first place, I did not understand nor do I mean that it was to confer upon the State authorities the right to set aside the reservations. But is it not a fact that even when this authority is given in this bill you have got to go to get the consent of the State authorities in which the public land is located?

Mr. LACEY. They have no such right.

Mr. SHAFROTH (to Mr. HILL). Why is not that right?

Mr. LACEY. To create this reservation the President must get that consent.

Mr. HILL. The gentleman from Colorado asks, "Why is not that right?" Now, I have always been in favor of transferring certain lands in those States to the State authorities, but the gentleman who asked the question, and others from that section, believe that they can not trust themselves with it after they have been given it, and therefore they want everything to be irrigated for them and administered.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I would like for the gentleman to say what authority he has for that opinion.

Mr. HILL. I will be just as quick to transfer the irrigation of lands in the States to the control of the State authority as I would the forest reserves.

Mr. RODEY. In these provisions you have provided that the governor of a State must consent before the reservation is increased or established. Why do you not grant the same privilege to the Territories? Does not the gentleman know that the same reasons exists there for such consent?

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the same reasons exist there at all; nor do I think that the same safeguard would exist there by reason of putting that limitation in. I have no objection to that limitation, and would be entirely willing for my friend from New Mexico [Mr. RODEY] to move the amendment, and should have no objection to the modification as to Territories; but the governors of these Territories are appointed by the President, and for the President of the United States to go to his appointee and ask his consent to create such a preserve would seem hardly necessary. But the governor does not represent the people of a Territory, as the governor of a State does. I would have no objection to putting that same limitation in as to the Territories, if gentlemen want it done, although I do not think it would do any good.

Mr. RODEY. I think it would for this reason: The Department might come down into the Territory and create a forest reserve which the people have enjoyed as a pasture from time immemorial. The Department would include in that reserve lands unfit to be reserved, and if the governor of a Territory had a right to advise about it, they might not be created so precipitately, and we might not have to come to Washington and work for a month to get such matters reconsidered. These reserves are nearly always created by mere proclamation or Executive order without any notice to the people. We had one created, the Gila River Forest Reservation, in New Mexico, which included and still includes thousands of acres that did not have a tree on it and never will have, and we have not succeeded in having that portion eliminated yet.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption?

Mr. LACEY. Certainly.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I believe the gentleman has stated that one of the reasons for the transfer of the forest reserves to the Department of Agriculture is that the Secretary of the Interior is very much overworked. I would like to ask the gentleman what position the Secretary of the Interior has taken upon this bill?

Mr. LACEY. He agrees with the President of the United States that this transfer ought to be made. I understand there is full harmony in the Administration on this question. He desires to have the transfer made, and he believes that the forestry could be better handled and administered in the Agricultural Department.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Does the gentleman wish to be understood that this bill has the unqualified support of the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. LACEY. I do not know how far I ought to quote verbal statements of the Secretary, but I will say this, that the Secretary is in hearty accord with the purposes of this bill and the transfer. In fact the bill was submitted to him after it was drawn and examined by him. In his annual report he favors this measure.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield to me for another question?

Mr. LACEY. Certainly.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. What was the Bureau of Forestry created for?

Mr. LACEY. The Bureau of Forestry was created to study the question of forestry in the United States, its bearings on agriculture, the best methods of preserving the existing forests, the restoring of those that had been partly or wholly destroyed; in short, it was an experimental forestry bureau in which were collected the best experts that could be got in the United States, and they have been giving careful study and attention to this question for years, and their support has been provided for by the various appropriations for the Department of Agriculture from year to year ever since the creation of the Bureau.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. It is purely a scientific bureau?

Mr. LACEY. It is a scientific bureau and a practical bureau as well. It is a bureau that has been giving this question careful study from a scientific standpoint and from a practical standpoint also.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I would like to ask the gentleman if there is anything for the Forestry Bureau to do, outside of dealing with these scientific matters, that would practically include the forestry reservations in the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. LACEY. If the gentleman alludes to legal titles, I will say that is expressly excluded from this bill. Every other question as to the control of the reservation would be with the Agricultural Department—the marking and selling or cutting of the trees, permits for grazing, protection against fire, and all of those regulations would be entirely within the control of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Is it not true that there is a question of boundary involved in these matters?

Mr. LACEY. There was such a question, but that applies now only in part.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Let me explain. There are many settlers whose rights within the forest reserves are undetermined at the present time. There are parties who have the right to take lieu lands in other parts of the country. Then the mineral laws are applicable, are they not, to the forest reservations, and mineral entries may be made therein? Now, if I understand this bill, the Interior Department will still retain jurisdiction of all these questions. Am I right?

Mr. LACEY. The gentleman is entirely correct in his statement.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Then why not transfer the Bureau of Forestry, which I understand is purely a scientific bureau, from the Agricultural Department to the Interior Department, so that the scientific part of this question may be looked after under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, instead of having two bureaus with two distinct heads, as you will have under this bill?

Mr. LACEY. I have already tried to make myself clear on that point, having devoted to it a considerable portion of my remarks. I endeavored to show that as a matter of administration, as to the propagation of trees, as to their preservation, and as to all these various matters of administration of forestry the Department of Agriculture is better fitted by the nature and purpose of its organization than any other department of this Government. In other words, we are entering upon a great system of what might be called tree farming—raising timber for future generations; and the Department that has the looking after the agriculture of the country, the Department that protects especially the interests of the farmer, is better capable of handling this branch of the administration of these reserves than any other department. The protection of the forests is essential to the farmer.

Now, I remember, Mr. Chairman, when I was a little boy, going out in the hills of my native State to gather service berries, I was surprised to see that the gentleman in charge of the party of children took an ax along. I soon found after we got into the woods what the ax was for. It was to cut down the trees in order to gather the berries. We cut the trees down and gathered the fruit. And I am credibly informed that there never have been any berries in that forest since. Every gentleman here who has passed middle life will recollect just such an offense against nature as that.

Now, Mr. Chairman, when our fathers landed on these shores, they had the idea that the forest was the enemy of mankind. There was in the mind of the white man the idea that there were two special duties to be performed—one to cut down the trees and the other to kill the aborigines.

Mr. MANN. If we had done neither we would not have been here now. [Laughter.]

Mr. LACEY. That is true. But we are here. And the trees were useful to the aborigines and are now useful to us. They should be preserved for use and not from use. And the aborigines that remain are becoming civilized; and we are trying to take care of them also. And we have made the discovery, Mr. Chairman, that the forests can not be destroyed as a whole without changing the climate of the country itself; and therefore in that high sense of taking care of the farmer all over the United States it is necessary to take care of the forests of the United States.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Allow me to suggest that the reason for attacking the forests and the savages ceased when either the forest or the savage ceased to be dangerous. [Laughter.]

Mr. LACEY. I think that is an exceedingly apt explanation of the situation.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. It may have escaped my attention, but I have not heard the gentleman state what will be the cost of this measure, how many additional employees will be required. Will he be so kind as to give us his best estimate of the number of extra employees that will be needed in the widest practical range of the operations of this bill?

Mr. LACEY. Not a single additional employee will be required. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. McRAE] has prepared an amendment, which I shall support, providing that as fast as it becomes proper to transfer a reserve from the custody of the Department of the Interior to the Department of Agriculture a corresponding number of the force of the Interior Department shall be transferred. In other words, no more employees will be required than at present. We have these two Bureaus, or rather we have a Division and a Bureau, and we have the employees in both. The same amount of forest land will exist after any portion is transferred to the Department of Agriculture, and you simply transfer the men having it in charge. For instance, there are a certain number of custodians of the Grand Canyon Reserve, of Arizona, and the San Francisco Forest Reserve. Now, if those two reserves are transferred to the Department of Agriculture the employees will also be transferred, and the expense will be precisely the same as if it was handled by the Department of the Interior. It makes no change whatever.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. And the gentleman is satisfied there would be no additional employees and no extra payment of money necessary under his bill?

Mr. LACEY. None whatever.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The gentleman differs widely from the other members of his committee.

Mr. LACEY. Perhaps that is where I am wrong, or they may be wrong.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The gentleman from Iowa admits there would be divided jurisdiction?

Mr. LACEY. No; I say there is divided jurisdiction now; has been for years.

Mr. HEMENWAY. And it would be divided to a still greater extent if this was transferred.

Mr. LACEY. No, sir; it would gradually be absorbed all in one. The bill provides for the elimination of the present division of work.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Does the gentleman seek to transfer the determination of legal questions now determined by the Interior Department to the Agricultural Department?

Mr. LACEY. No, sir; nor would I transfer the determination of those legal questions from the Attorney-General or the courts of justice.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Then in the event that some one has entered ground in one of these forest reserves and seeks to transfer that entry to other public lands, would that question be determined by the Agricultural Department?

Mr. LACEY. Not all.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Would not the same clerks that have to determine those questions or deal with those questions have to be retained in the Interior Department and new clerks put in the Agricultural Department to take care of these forest reserves if they are transferred to the Agricultural Department?

Mr. LACEY. No. The gentleman misapprehends the scope of this bill.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Not at all.

Mr. LACEY. There are two duties to perform in regard to forest reserves. There are duties in relation to private individuals who have interests in public lands. Those matters are for the Land Department. Matters from the Land Department may be transferred by mandamus to the courts. If a patent is issued, a direct proceeding may be brought in chancery to compel the patentee to become a trustee for the benefit of the real equitable owner of the property. Now, all those matters are matters of a legal nature, and are controlled by the Land Department as a court. The control of the forest reserves, taking care of timber, and all that, has nothing whatever to do with a proposition of this kind.

Mr. HEMENWAY. What is done to control the forest reserves now other than to protect them with the forest rangers that are there, and to determine whether or not settlers are entitled to timber from the forest reserves, and to determine when parties having claims in the forest reserves can transfer them to other public lands—what other than that duty has anybody to perform?

Mr. LACEY. The Land Department of the Government has charge, exclusive of Alaska, of 600,000,000 acres of land—a pretty big farm. That includes the minerals; it includes the forest reserves and the national parks; that includes all of the land in which the Government of the United States had and retains the original title. Now, the work in regard to this business is divided up. We have a forestry division of the Land Office. That foresty division has nothing whatever to do with these questions of title. All questions of title are disposed of in other divisions of the Land Office. We have another division of the Land Office that has charge of the minerals and another one that has charge of patents, and so on.

The work is all thoroughly divided, and the control of the forestry to-day by the Land Office is in a separate division, just as separate as though it belonged to the Department of Agriculture, and there is no conflict, either necessary or possible, between the settling of private rights or the rights between the public and a private individual as to a quarter section of land or a mine in a forest reserve and the question of administering and caring for the timber that stands on the undisputed part of that forest reserve. We have to-day three different jurisdictions—the Geological Survey, that surveys the boundaries; the forestry division of the Land Office, that handles the timber and does the work that is proposed to be done under this bill, and, third, we have the Bureau of Forestry in the Department of Agriculture, with a full and complete force capable of relieving the Department of the Interior of a considerable portion of this work; and thus the bill is in the interests of economy, and would result in a reduction of the force instead of necessitating its enlargement.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman refers to the work of the Geological Survey in the forest reserves. I do not understand that the gentleman proposes to transfer the survey of the reserves to the Agricultural Department.

Mr. LACEY. Not at all. I only say that by way of explanation as to the divided jurisdiction.

Mr. MONDELL. So that they would still have to do with that if the bill passed.

Mr. LACEY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. If I understand the gentleman, the principal reason for making this transfer is that the Interior Department is overworked.

Mr. LACEY. No; that is only one of the reasons. That is perhaps the least reason of all, but it is a good reason.

Mr. MANN. Why does the gentleman say that the Interior Department is overworked? For instance, the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has been considering a bill for the creation of a department of commerce. Hearings have been going on for some time on that subject, but there has been no suggestion to transfer any of these departments out of the Interior Department.

Mr. LACEY. Oh, yes, there is; to transfer one of the greatest of all of them, the Patent Office.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. And the Census.

Mr. LACEY. And the Census Office.

Mr. MANN. The Patent Office is not in the bill, and the Census Office is an entirely separate office.

Mr. LACEY. Is it true that an objection is made to the transfer of the Patent Office?

Mr. MANN. The Patent Office is not in the bill as it passed the Senate, and no one has come from the Interior Department to ask that it be transferred.

Mr. LACEY. So far as the Patent Office is concerned, it is a compact office, complete in its organization and in all its parts. The Land Office, on the other hand, has a vast jurisdiction and an enormous labor upon it and divided duties. The Patent Office is a separate office that could as well be run under the Attorney-General. The only point would be that there must be some sort of an appellate tribunal to try cases, and that has been simplified in the Patent Office by making provision for the transfer of all these questions to the courts, so as finally to adjudicate private rights in regard to patents on inventions.

Mr. MANN. Is not the Land Office practically a separate office, by itself?

Mr. LACEY. Yes; but I am speaking of the divided duty which it has. Patents are all alike. They all involve inventions. The Land Office involves minerals, forestry, and various matters of agriculture. There are a great many things. There is a large variety of business, and, familiar as I have of necessity become by long connection with the legislation in this House on the subject of the public lands, I find that that department is one of the most overloaded departments of the Government and that after these 46,000,000 acres of land are finally set apart to the Department of Agriculture there will still be half a billion and more of acres left for the Land Office to take care of.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman a technical question?

Mr. LACEY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I notice you state here that the powers vested in the Department of the Interior shall be exercised by the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. LACEY. Where does the gentleman find that?

Mr. MANN. From the first section, on the first page. What I wish to ask the gentleman is this: Whether that would cover powers conferred upon the Secretary of the Interior, which I presume is the form of the law as it exists?

Mr. LACEY. All powers that the Secretary of the Interior now has in an untransferred reserve would hereafter be exercised by the Secretary of Agriculture in such reserve when it was transferred, with the exception of those questions of title which are reserved in another part of the bill.

Mr. MANN. That would depend on whether your law transfers the power. It does not say that the powers conferred upon the Secretary of the Interior shall be transferred, but that the powers conferred upon the Department of the Interior shall be transferred.

Mr. LACEY. There is no distinction between the Department of the Interior and the Secretary of the Interior in the use of this language. The Secretary of the Interior is the head of that Department.

Mr. MANN. I wanted to know if the gentleman has considered that.

Mr. LACEY. I think so. We have endeavored to cover and anticipate the point which my friend makes, which I think is worthy of consideration.

Mr. MANN. You have been discussing the question of the transfer of these forest reserves from one department to another. Is not the real milk in the cocoanut in this bill the power to create game preserves and special preserves for the propagation of game?

Mr. RODEY. Buffalo Jones's bill is the real milk in the cocoanut.

Mr. LACEY. I will say upon that that the minority of the committee, in their report, have eliminated from the bill every feature of transfer, and the committee are unanimous upon the game feature of the bill, there being absolutely no difference of opinion in the committee on that question.

Mr. MANN. I notice that section 2 has a limitation upon the power to make a forest reserve a game and fish reserve, limiting it to the request of the governor of a State; and in section 4 I find that that limitation is wiped out, by conferring it upon the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of the Interior, and it has been conferred upon the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of the Interior so as to cover all forest reserves, the power to maintain special reserves, not game or fish reserves, but special reserves for the protection of any kind of native animal. So that that wipes out the limitation.

Mr. LACEY. As to that particular thing.

Mr. MANN. But it covers everything.

Mr. LACEY. Not at all. There are few wild animals to-day controlled by private individuals; but a few buffaloes still remain.

Mr. MANN. But this says that they shall have power to form forest reserves under either Department—to establish and maintain special preserves——

Mr. LACEY. Certainly.

Mr. MANN:

on any forest reservation for the propagation and perpetuation of the American bison, catalo, or other cross breeds, or other American animals, and shall have power to transfer to such preserves any native game whenever, in his opinion, such animal is threatened with extermination.

Now, that covers everything.

Mr. LACEY. Not at all.

Mr. MANN. Does not that cover all native animals?

Mr. LACEY. The purpose is to allow the creation of special reservations for the use of bison and other indigenous American animals, and they shall have power to transfer these animals to such reservations. That is the general purpose of this bill. Now, let me say——

Mr. MANN. Who is to be the judge?

Mr. LACEY. Let me make an explanation. There are to-day perhaps in the whole world, as I have said, not exceeding 500 buffaloes. There are two or three small herds of those buffaloes. Under this provision the Secretary of the Interior, without the consent of the governor or anybody else, can permit them to be set apart; he can to-day, without the consent of the governor, also lease and permit men to put in these same reserves cattle, horses, or sheep, and this provision gives him the same power as to these few remaining animals that are thus held by private ownership, just the same as to the other domestic animals.

Mr. MANN. Why do you say these "few animals" is the limitation?

Mr. LACEY. There are a very few animals to which this provision could be made applicable. There are to-day perhaps 100 of a certain variety of elk in the southern end of the San Joaquin Valley, only one body of them in the world. The proposition has been made to gather them up and put them in a forest reserve. They are the only remaining ones of their species. A part of the Allard herd of buffaloes would probably be put upon some one of these reservations. Now, so far as I know, the only animals anywhere in the United States that can thus be transferred are those two particular herds, and possibly one or two other buffalo herds. There are perhaps three or four small buffalo herds that could thus be transferred, and the right is given here, without asking the governor whether he consents to this or not, whether these little herds should be put into either one of the reservations recommended in the bill. If my friend thinks that there ought to be some further limitation put upon this protection, I am perfectly willing that it shall be done. I will have no objection to it, because there is no purpose such as he imagines might be concealed in this section of the bill, and when we come down to this particular section I shall be glad for him to call attention to it, and if any amendment can be made that is necessary it can be done.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will pardon me, I have a great deal of faith in the opinion of the gentleman from Iowa about game animals. I have heard him often, and have always believed him as to the extermination of certain native game animals and birds, but it seems to me a provision like this would let the Secretary of Agriculture or the Secretary of the Interior take any of the animals in the United States on the ground that they were liable to be exterminated and establish a special reservation for them.

Mr. LACEY. I see no objection whatever to that, but if my friend does, I am willing to limit it. I think the moose might be cared for in that way. It has been almost exterminated.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. LACEY. Certainly.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I understood one of the reasons why the gentleman claimed this bill should pass was that the Bureau of Forestry was fully organized and had a full force, and could relieve the Interior Department. Would the gentleman go so far as to say that the members of the Bureau of Forestry have nothing to do, and will not have anything to do if this bill does not pass?

Mr. LACEY. The Bureau of Forestry has a great deal to do. They have been aiding the various States in forestry matters. I would give them more national work to do, and this bill will have that effect. The more national work that is put upon them the better.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Does not the gentleman think that they will ask for bigger appropriations?

Mr. LACEY. I hope they will get whatever is necessary to do this work. I do not want to be misunderstood about it. I believe the subject of forestry has not come to the attention of the American people any too soon, and if there is some money expended in it it is well expended, and some money should be expended there. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I am not here to be frightened about a little matter of that kind. Money that is spent upon one or two creeks in impossible attempts at making them navigable would take care of this great interest that is of vital importance to that body of our citizens upon which every other part of the American people must depend—the farmers of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the question of expenditures is in safe hands. Our friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], chairman of Appropriations, has been renominated and he is in good health. [Laughter.] God spare him long to look after the finances of this nation! I have no question but he will look after these appropriations with that care with which he has scrutinized all appropriations. I am willing to trust him. He is a little hard, sometimes, to get money out of, but it always comes in the end if the object is worthy.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, "the gentleman from Illinois" has no more to do by way of jurisdiction, nor has the committee to which he belongs, with the Forestry Bureau in the Agricultural Department than the man in the moon. It stands without organic law. It abounds only in appropriations. It has grown in thirteen years from $8,000 to $300,000. It does nothing but scientific work, and no man has been able to get a statement of what that scientific work is.

Mr. LACEY. Well, Mr. Chairman, I may have to take back some of the good words I have just uttered. [Laughter.] Of course the gentleman from Illinois is not chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, but all of the various committees that have their appropriation bills—the Military Committee, the Agricultural Committee, and the various committees that have appropriation bills—always sit at the feet and take counsel of the gentleman from Illinois. He knows more of the subject than any other man knows, and they do well to take his judgment. This matter would be under the eagle eye of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and also of the gentleman who has charge of the Agricultural Committee; they would constantly inspect this appropriation.

Mr. CANNON. I hope the Committee of the Whole will take my judgment on this matter, and if they do, they will cut it off right close up behind the ears by striking out the enacting clause. [Great laughter.]

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, I hope they will not do any such thing. I had the same controversy with the gentleman from Illinois in regard to another bill some years ago, in which he saw immense trouble and danger, but it has worked out precisely the opposite from what he thought it would. It is well that somebody should see nothing but evil in appropriations. There never was a train yet that did not have a brake on it. There must be a brake, but you can not run the train with a brake alone—not successfully. While I commend my friend generally, here in this case he is exercising his judgment without giving attention to the real purpose of the bill. From his committee have come in bills on subjects that I did not agree with him upon that appropriated more money in a single year than this whole Bureau of Forestry would consume in ten years; but it was his judgment and the House followed it, and I accepted his judgment. But when it comes to matters of legislation we have the President of the United States asking for this bill in his annual message and we have the Department of the Interior approving and asking for it. We have a bill that has for its purpose the preservation and conservation and administration of our forests.

Whatever expense may attend this work will be contributed by the American people and appropriated by the Congress of the United States, and the revenues from the forests will finally more than pay the expenses. These forest reserves will become an asset instead of a liability. To-day the administration of forestry in the Philippine Islands is one of the principal sources of revenue there, and that forestry work is administered under the Spanish law, which has been reenacted, with some modifications, by the Philippine Commission. Under prudent and proper management our forests will become sources of revenue over and above all possible expense in their management.

Without these forests in our Western mountains the desolation of the mountains of Palestine and Southern Italy will be soon duplicated in the United States. We must learn from the mistakes of others. North Carolina is asking to have her hills again restored to a forest state, so as to bless and fertilize the valleys below. Let us move in time in the arid regions of our Western domain.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Before the gentleman sits down, I would like to ask him one question for information. There is now a division of forestry, as I understand, in the Interior Department and also a bureau of forestry in the Agricultural Department. Does the division of forestry in the Interior Department, which now has control of the forest reserves, undertake to maintain any scientific supervision or scientific promotion of the forest growth and development?

Mr. LACEY. They never have done so until quite recently, when they borrowed a scientist from the Agricultural Department, had him sent over there, and are endeavoring to organize that division on a somewhat more scientific basis. In fact, Mr. Chairman, the control exercised by the Department of the Interior over the management of forest reserves has been almost wholly that of trying to prevent fires.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Now, I understand the work of the Interior Department is growing into a scientific supervision, and, therefore, before many years we shall have two bureaus organized for the purpose of scientifically promoting the preservation and the development of the forests in this country, unless we take some measure to concentrate this work in a single bureau or division.

Mr. LACEY. Unless we put the work into a single department that must be the result. In short, this bill provides for an ultimate reduction and concentration of this service into a single department adequate to the control of this work, and fully and completely organized to carry it on.

I append the opinion of the Attorney-General, to which I have referred:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, Washington, D. C., January 3, 1902.

SIR: Complying with the request therefor contained in your note of December 5, 1901, I here transmit to you some of my views upon the questions there suggested. These questions are as to the power of Congress to enact laws for the protection and control of or relating to our national forest reserves when within the limits of a State, and specifically to make such reserves, to some extent, refuges for the preservation of the remnant of the game in those localitities. They necessarily involve, also, substantially the same questions as applicable to the general public domain, for so far as concerns the question of Federal legislative power no difference in principle is perceived.

I quite agree with you that as to those reserves situated within a Territory of the United States this Federal legislative power is ample, and the questions are those arising when such reserves are within the limits of a State; but in order to the determination of those it may be well to refer briefly to the nature and source of this Federal power over the Territories.

As to the source of this power there has been a diversity of opinion, and the power is claimed to have arisen from that provision of the Constitution which gives Congress the "power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory and other property belonging to the United States;" and other sources of this power have been suggested; but, whatever its origin, the existence of this power, as the Supreme Court has several times said, is undoubted.

While, in the Dred Scott case (19 How., 393), it was held that this constitutional provision applied only to such territory as the United States then had and did not apply to that subsequently acquired by treaty or conquest, this has not been acquiesced in in later cases, several of which point to this provision as, at least, one of the sources of the power and control which Congress exercises over the various Territories. And, I think, it may be taken as now settled that this provision confers upon Congress the power stated over all the Territories.

Congress, then, having sovereignty and ample legislative control of the Territories while they are such and of the public lands therein, one important question is how far this sovereignty and right of control is surrendered to the State by its admission into the Union. And here we may look again to the Constitution, then to the acts admitting such States, and to their constitutions when admitted.

And, first, as to the Federal Constitution. Assuming, as I think we may, that the provision above referred to applies to all "territory and other property belonging to the United States," whether then already or subsequently acquired, what was the intended limit of the duration of the power thus conferred? Was it intended to continue only until the new State was admitted, and to then cease and leave Congress and the Government without any power to "dispose of" or to "make needful rules and regulations respecting" the public lands or "other property" belonging to the United States, or was it intended to continue as long as its subject-matter and its necessity continued? If the former, we must look to some other source for the power of Congress to dispose of and regulate the management of the public domain within the limits of a State. If the latter, then this provision is ample.

I do not consider here the case of military forts, posts, dockyards, etc., for which special provision is made in the Constitution, nor sites for post-offices, court-houses, etc., the question of jurisdiction over which is generally settled by convention.

When the Constitution was adopted we had but one Territory, though it is fair to suppose that others were looked upon as possible; but the one that we had was acquired under conditions which required its admission into the Union in not less than three nor more than five States, with equal sovereignty with that of the original States, and the Constitution provided for the admission of new States. Thus, with the subject of new States directly in mind, did the framers intend to give Congress power to dispose of and manage the public lands while in a Territory and to leave it without the power to do either after a State was admitted? For it could not have escaped them that to confer this power while the Territory remained such was, by the strongest implication, to deny it afterwards. Did they intend this?

In the first place—and this is quite sufficient for its construction—the provision itself imposes no limitation, either of time or of Territorial or State condition; nor does the nature of the power conferred imply any such limitation. On the contrary, the power is as broad and general as language could make it, with no limitation whatever, either expressed or implied. And the reason and necessity for the power are tenfold stronger after the admission of the State than during the existence of the Territory; and there is no rule of law or of construction which will permit us to impose a limitation which neither the instrument itself nor the nature of the power imposes or implies. And the general rule is that when a power is conferred without limitation, expressed or implied, it continues as long as the necessity for its exercise. And the Supreme Court has more than once said (as in Gibson v. Choteau, 13 Wall., 92, on p. 99) "That power is subject to no limitations."

The difficulty and misconstruction here arises chiefly from the use, in this clause, of the word "territory." If, instead, the expression had been that Congress should have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the land and other property, there could have been no question but that this power of disposition and control continued after statehood as before. But this is exactly what the provision does mean. It does not refer to organized Territories, as to which the term "dispose of," and make "rules and regulations" and "other property" are not appropriate; but it refers to land and other property. And this is expressly held in United States v. Grotiot (13 Pet., 526), where it is said (p. 536):

"The term territory, as here used, is merely descriptive of the kind of property, and is equivalent to the word lands. And Congress has the same power over it as over any other property belonging to the United States, and this power is vested in Congress without limitation."

This of itself would seem to make the meaning fairly certain. Consider the situation. After a long struggle, which had long delayed the adoption of the Constitution, the people had finally settled the ownership and sovereignty of the lands outside of the States in the General Government. It was claimed that as this territory had been wrested from Great Britain by the blood and treasure of the people of all the States it should be held for their common benefit, and not for any State, and it was finally so settled and agreed and the whole territory ceded to the United States for the common benefit of all. At that time, next to State jealousy of Federal power—if second to even that—there were mutual State jealousies of the power of each other, and this was one of the causes of the dispute over the public territory, and yet it was certain and well known that on the admission of the expected new States, with their sovereignty within their borders, all of the sovereignty and control of this territory within their borders which was not in the United States would be in those States, respectively, and that that sovereignty and control which they had so long struggled to place in the United States would be passed over to these three to five States as they were admitted. This was certain to be the case, for if Congress did not have this sovereignty and control after a State was admitted, then the State did have it, and no other State could interfere.

These States might then, by unfriendly legislation or by no legislation, or both, so hamper these lands, their sale, occupancy, and control as to render them of little value except to those States and their people. It is simply incredible that this was intended. If it was not, then it was intended that this vital power of disposal and control should continue at a time when, of all others, it was most needed. While the Territory remained such the sovereignty of the United States was complete without any other grant than that contained in the cession, and this special grant of power was not at all necessary. Its chief if not its only use and purpose was that, when and after these lands passed into and under the sovereignty of a State, they should do so subject to the paramount sovereignty of the United States so far as was needful.

In framing this dual government, this imperium in imperio in which each State was to be in many respects sovereign in the nation, and the nation in many respects sovereign in each State, the separation of these sovereignties and their lines of demarcation must have received the most careful attention of those statesmen as one of the most important and difficult problems which confronted them. And, as the control and disposal of this Territory was one of the most important and burning questions of the time, and had long been such, delaying and, for a time, endangering the adoption of the Constitution, it would seem impossible that when dealing directly with this question provision was made for this control while in a Territorial state, and when it was little needed, and purposely omitted at a period when, of all others, it was most needed. We shall come nearer to the real meaning of this provision by reading it as it is so plainly written, without any limitation, either of time or Territorial or State condition.

If authority for this construction be needed it is not lacking, and in another connection I shall refer to some cases which come first to hand.

Assuming then, as I think we must, that this constitutional provision confers upon Congress the power of disposition and control of the public lands after the admission into the Union of the States containing them, how much, if any, of this power is surrendered to the States by the acts admitting them into the Union as sovereign States? And here the general rule is certain (although questions may arise as to its application to particular cases). So far as its exercise is needful to the disposition and full control and management of these lands, Congress has always been and is incapable of diverting alienating, or surrendering any part of it. It is uniformly held that while the title of the United States to the public lands is absolute as against every other title, yet it is held in trust for the ultimate benefit of all the people in such manner as may be prescribed by law, and this is peculiarly the case as to the only Territory we had at that time. Congress, then, being a trustee of the title, can not divert, alienate, or surrender any power necessary or proper for the disposal, protection, preservation, control, or management of its lands, nor in any way discharge itself from the duty of executing the trust confided to it.

But while this power to make all needful rules and regulations is also the power to determine what are needful, and while, therefore, this power so conferred is, in terms absolute and unlimited, yet, notwithstanding some general statements of the Supreme Court, it may be well claimed that, after the admission of a State, there is necessarily a limit arising from other portions of the Constitution and the general powers of the State. For example, may Congress continue to legislate for this public land—some of it, perhaps, in small, isolated quantities—upon all subjects of municipal legislation, civil and criminal, and irrespective of the laws of the State upon the same subjects, as it does, for example, in the District of Columbia? Or, on the other hand, is the power of Congress within a State limited to such acts, legislative or otherwise, as are required for the disposal, protection, and control of such lands? Or is there, between these, a limit to Federal power, legislative or executive? It is not necessary to discuss here the first of these questions, for no such general legislation is contemplated, and the other two, and also how far Federal control has been surrendered by acts admitting States into the Union, may be examined in the light of another consideration, viz, the rights incident to ownership.

Subject to the eminent domain of the State, the collection of taxes, the service of process, and other kindred superior rights, the ownership of land carries with it, as incident to and a part of such ownership, the right of exclusive possession and control, which includes the right to forbid and prevent intrusion thereon for any purpose and to prevent and remove trespassers. The owner may forcibly prevent such intrusions if he can, or he may apply to the courts for relief or to recover damages. But a private individual may not himself enact laws for the protection of his property or to punish trespassers upon his lands. Is the United States in the same situation as to its lands within a State? Is it without power to itself enact laws for the disposal or management of its public lands within a State, or for their protection from fires, or the preservation of its timber or minerals thereon? This is undoubtedly the case, if the United States, as to such lands, has no other rights than those of an ordinary proprietor.

And it must be admitted that much that is said by the court in Fort Leavenworth Railroad Company v. Lowe (114 U. S., 525) is directly to the effect that as to lands within a State, unless jurisdiction is reserved in admitting a State, or the land is acquired by the United States with the consent of the State for military purposes, etc., as provided in the Constitution, the United States has no other rights than those of an ordinary proprietor, and that, like other lands, they are subject to the sole jurisdiction and sovereignty of the State. And it is in view of this that I discuss this question more elaborately than I otherwise would. But if what is there said is to be considered as a denial of all legislative power of Congress over such lands, not only is it opposed to the uniform practice of the Government from the beginning, with the frequent approval of that court, and to many contrary declarations of that court, but the contrary is directly held in later cases.

But what is said in that case must be read with reference to and in the light of the case then before the court. The question in that case was that of the exclusive jurisdiction, or not, of the United States over that part of the reservation not used for military purposes. Upon the admission of Kansas no reservation of Federal jurisdiction was made, but later the State ceded that jurisdiction to the United States with this saving clause, viz, the right to serve civil and criminal State processes therein, and "saving further to said State the right to tax railroad, bridge, and other corporations, their franchises and property on said reservation." The State levied a tax on a railroad on this reservation, and the question of its power to do so depended upon whether the reservation was in the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States. The court held that, inasmuch as it was not purchased with the consent of the State "for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dockyards, and other needful buildings," under clause 17, section 8, Article I, of the Constitution, the United States had no such exclusive jurisdiction, and that, under this saving clause, the State had power to tax the railroad property; and that the only way by which the United States could acquire this exclusive jurisdiction within a State was that provided by the Constitution, viz, by purchase with the consent of the State.

The question of concurrent jurisdiction or of Federal jurisdiction for some purposes was not discussed nor even mentioned, for it was not involved. Nor was any allusion made to that other constitutional provision giving to Congress the power to make needful rules, etc., which certainly gave to Congress much greater power than is possessed by an ordinary proprietor. And, if the court decided that it did not do so, or did not apply to lands within a State, or decided anything else upon a question of such vast importance, it did so sub silentio by saying nothing about it. That is not the way in which that court settles questions of such importance.

From the beginning the whole policy and practice of the Government in respect of its public lands has been based upon the generally unquestioned power of Congress to legislate for their disposal, management, and protection, in both Territories and States, and with the frequent approval of the Supreme Court. It is needless to refer to these various acts of legislation as to lands in States and Territories. Their name is legion, but each and every one of these acts was the assertion and the exercise of Federal jurisdiction and sovereignty, and of a right far superior to that of any mere proprietor as to lands within a State.

This must have been either because, in the admission of the State, the jurisdiction necessary for that purpose was either expressly or impliedly reserved—the latter of which is not probable—or because the constitutional provision referred to confers that power, and this would seem a quite sufficient source of power.

In Gibson v. Choteau (13 Wall., 92) it is said in the syllabus that "the power of Congress in the disposal of the public domain can not be interfered with or its exercise embarrassed by any State legislation." And on page 99: "With respect to the public domain, the Constitution vests in Congress the power of disposition and of making all needful rules and regulations. That power is subject to no limitations." Nothing could be more conclusive that this constitutional provision applies also to lands within a State, and that the legislative power thus conferred is paramount.

In Jorden v. Bennett (4 How., 169) it is said (p. 184):

"By the Constitution Congress is given power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory and other property of the United States for the disposal of the public lands. Therefore, in the new States where such lands be Congress may provide by law, and having the constitutional power to pass the law, it is supreme. So Congress may prohibit and punish trespassers on the public lands. Having the power of disposal and of protection, Congress alone can deal with the title, and no State law, whether of limitation or otherwise, can defeat such title."

This was the holding of the Supreme Court up to the time when the Fort Leavenworth case was decided, and it is not supposable that that court intended to then overrule these cases and deny this legislative power of Congress and all other powers save such as belong to an ordinary individual proprietor, while making no reference whatever to its previous holdings. That it did not so intend is manifest from the only other case which I shall cite upon this question, that of Camfield v. United States (167 U. S., 518), where it is said in the syllabus:

"The Government of the United States has, with respect to its own lands within the limits of a State, the rights of an ordinary proprietor to maintain its possession and to prosecute trespassers; and may legislate for their protection, though such legislation may involve the exercise of the police power."

And on pages 524, 525, the powers of the Government, both as an individual proprietor and as a sovereign, are well stated:

"The lands in question are all within the State of Colorado. The Government has, with respect to its own lands, the rights of an ordinary proprietor to maintain its possession and to prosecute trespassers. It may deal with such lands precisely as any private individual may deal with his farming property. It may sell or withhold them from sale. It may grant them in aid of railways or other public enterprises. It may open them to preemption or homestead settlement, but it would be recreant to its duties as trustee for the people of the United States to permit any individual or private corporation to monopolize them for private gain and thereby practically drive intending settlers from the market."

And on page 525:

"The General Government doubtless has a power over its own property analogous to the police power of the several States, and the extent to which it may go in the exercise of such power is measured by the exigencies of the particular case. If it be found to be necessary for the protection of the public or of intending settlers to forbid all inclosures of public lands, the Government may do so, though the alternate sections of private lands are thereby rendered less valuable for pasturage. The inconvenience, or even damage, to the individual proprietor does not authorize an act which is in its nature a purpresture of Government lands. While we do not undertake to say that Congress has the unlimited power to legislate against nuisances within a State which it would have within a Territory, we do not think the admission of a Territory as a State deprives it of the power of legislating for the protection of the public lands, though it may thereby involve the exercise of what is ordinarily known as the police power, so long as such power is directed solely to its own protection. A different rule would place the public domain of the United States completely at the mercy of State legislation."

This, so manifestly the correct doctrine, would seem to cover and to settle the whole question and to authorize the proposition that, as to public lands within a State, the Government has all the rights of an individual proprietor, supplemented with the power to make and enforce its own laws for the assertion of those rights and for the disposal and full and complete management, control, and protection of its lands.

Among these undoubted rights is the right of absolute or partial exclusion, either at all or at special times and for any or for special purposes.

While Congress certainly may by law prohibit and punish the entry upon or use of any part of these forest reserves for the purpose of the killing, capture, or pursuit of game, this would not be sufficient. There are many persons now on these reserves by authority of law, and people are expressly authorized to go there, and it would be necessary to go further and to prohibit the killing, capture, or pursuit of game, even though the entry upon the reserve is not for that purpose. But the right to forbid intrusion for the purpose of killing game is one thing, and the right to forbid and punish the killing, per se, and without reference to any trespass on the property, is another. The first may be forbidden as a trespass and for the protection of the property; but when a person is lawfully there and not a trespasser or intruder the question is different.

But I am decidedly of opinion that Congress may forbid and punish the killing of game on these reserves, no matter that the slayer is lawfully there and is not a trespasser. If Congress may prohibit the use of these reserves for any purpose, it may for another; and while Congress permits persons to be upon and use them for various purposes, it may fix limits to such use and occupation and prescribe the purpose and objects for which they shall not be used, as for the killing, capture, or pursuit of specified kinds of game. Generally any private owner may forbid, upon his own land, any act that he chooses, although the act may be lawful in itself; and certainly Congress, invested also with legislative power, may do the same thing, just as it may prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors, though such sale is otherwise lawful.

After considerable attention to the whole subject, I have no hesitation in expressing my opinion that Congress has ample power to forbid and punish any and all kinds of trespass upon or injury to the forest reserves, including the trespass of entering upon or using them for the killing, capture, or pursuit of game.

The exercise of these powers would not conflict with any State authority. Most of the States have laws forbidding the killing, capture, or pursuit of different kinds of game during specified portions of the year. This makes such killing, etc., lawful at other times, but only lawful because not made unlawful. And it is lawful only when the State has power to make it lawful by either implication or direct enactment. But, except in those cases already referred to, such as eminent domain, service of process, etc., no State has power to authorize or make lawful a trespass upon private property. So that, though Congress should prohibit such killing, etc., upon its own lands at all seasons of the year, this would not conflict with any State authority or control. That the preservation of game is part of the public policy of those States and for the benefit of their own people is shown by their own legislation, and they can not complain if Congress upon its own land goes even further in that direction than the State so long as the open season of the State law is not interfered with in any place where such law is paramount.

It has always been the policy of the Government to invite and induce the purchase and settlement of its public lands, and as the existence of game thereon and in their localities adds to the desirability of the lands and is a well-known inducement to their purchase, it may well be considered whether, for this purpose alone and without reference to the protection of the lands from trespass, Congress may not, on its own lands, prohibit the killing of such game.

Your other questions relate to the method of enforcing these Federal powers, if they exist, to the nature and kind of laws therefor. While such questions are peculiarly for Congress, yet, as you request it, I will suggest what occurs to me,

You very properly suggest the power of Congress over interstate commerce as tending indirectly to this end, by prohibiting interstate transportation of game, living or dead, or of the skins or any part thereof. There is some legislation upon that subject. I do not take the pains to examine this to see how sufficient it is; but if not already done, something to the end desired may be accomplished in this way, but as a remedy this would fall far short of what is required.

You allude also to the aid and cooperation of forest rangers and those in charge for the enforcement of State laws. This would be well, and especially so in the way of securing good feeling and harmonious action between Federal and State authorities. There is a provision for that in the act of March 3, 1899 (2 Sup. Rev Stats., 993), but it simply imposes a very general duty, and should be more specific as to what acts are required to be done.

In this connection, and with reference also to the general protection of these reserves and the other public lands from fires, cutting timber, killing game, and other depredations, I would suggest, in view of the existing law as to arrest without a warrant, whether it would not be well to give marshals and their deputies and the superintendents, supervisors, rangers, and other persons charged with the protection of these reserves power, on the public lands, in certain cases approaching "hot pursuit," to arrest without warrant.

Complaints come to this Department that very often the place of illegal acts is so far from the office of any magistrate, and the means of communication such, that before formal complaint can be made and an officer with a warrant sent there the offenders are beyond successful pursuit. I commend this to your consideration. No matter what laws we may have for the protection of these reserves, the public lands generally, or the game, they would be in a very great many cases wholly inefficient, owing to the impossibility, under the present law as to arrests, of their enforcement.

There are already many statutes against setting fires and trespassing upon the public lands. Perhaps these are sufficient, so far as laws go. I do not examine this; but as to the protection of game on forest reserves drastic laws for that purpose, together with better means, as above suggested, for their enforcement, are required.

I would suggest the making it an offense to enter or be upon or use any portion of a forest reserve for the purpose or with the intent to kill, capture, or pursue (certain specified kinds of) game, or to kill, capture, or pursue with intent to kill or capture such game, on any portion of such reserve, and I would do this for the whole year as to some kinds of game, at least, and make such killing, capture, or pursuit the evidence of such purpose or intent. The latter clause, as you will see, proceeds against the act itself, irrespective of any trespass upon the lands, if, indeed, such act does not necessarily involve a technical legal trespass. But this may be questionable in case, for example, when one who is properly there, kills game. I would insert it at any rate, and it will, with the other, operate as a preventive.

Respectfully,

P. C. KNOX, Attorney-General.

Hon. JOHN F. LACEY,
House of Representatives.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. GROSVENOR having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2975) granting an increase of pension to Levi Hachett.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 5906. An act declaring the Osage River to be not a navigable stream above the point where the line between the counties of Benton and St. Clair crosses said river.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

Senate concurrent resolution 46.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 9,000 copies of the document known as Messages and Papers of the Presidents, of which 3,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 6,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, the remainder, if any, to be held by the superintendent of documents, subject to the future action of Congress; and an edition of 10,000 copies shall be printed, to be held by the superintendent of documents and by him sold at the actual cost of publication.

TRANSFER OF FOREST RESERVES.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the bill under consideration contains two propositions. Section 1 provides for the transfer of all the forest reserves now under the management of the Interior Department to the Agricultural Department. The balance of the bill provides for the establishment of game preserves, both within and without forest reserves, and provides for the management and the administration of these game preserves. In the Committee on the Public Lands, before which this bill came for consideration, there was no considerable difference of opinion with regard to the provisions of the bill relative to the establishment of game preserves. But there was considerable difference of opinion with regard to the advisability of transferring the forest reserves from one department of the Government to another. I have no desire to occupy the time of the committee at any length on this question, but I feel it my duty as one of the minority members of the committee to submit the views of the minority relative to this proposed transfer. I ask therefore that the views of the minority of the committee be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The minority of the Committee on the Public Lands, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 11536) to transfer certain forest reserves from the Interior Department to the Department of Agriculture, and to authorize the setting apart of certain forest reserves as game preserves, make the following report:

This bill authorizes the transfer to the Agriculture Department, from time to time, of the forest reserves now under control of the Interior Department, and we are of the opinion that this very radical change in policy is impracticable, would be unwise, and exceedingly expensive; that it would lead to a very great friction between the Agricultural and the Interior Departments; would necessitate the creation of many new offices; would be detrimental to the interests of the Government and of the people as a whole, as well as of those living on or in the vicinity of the reserves.

The first objection to the transfer is that it is impossible of successful execution, and we call attention to the fact that the bill itself does not contemplate a complete transfer to the Department of Agriculture, but provides "that as to surveys and surveying, and as to exchanges of lieu land, patents, titles, and claims, the jurisdiction of the Department of the Interior shall be still retained;" so that instedd of the bill providing for a complete transfer it provides for only a partial transfer, and would necessarily lead to a divided jurisdiction.

About the only argument advanced by the majority for the transfer of these reserves to the Agricultural Department is that there is a thoroughly organized Bureau of Forestry in the Department of Agriculture, and that it would be necessary to organize a similar bureau in the Interior Department in order to obtain satisfactory administration of the forest reserves. If there were any weight in this argument at all it would warrant the creation in other departments of the Government of superfluous bureaus for the purpose of using the same as an argument for the transfer of governmental business from a department in which it belonged to another in which someone had succeeded in having an unnecessary bureau created.

If the Bureau of Forestry in the Agricultural Department is indeed a bureau without occupation it should be reduced in size or transferred to the Department of the Interior, but inasmuch as a considerably increased appropriation has been asked for that Bureau for the coming fiscal year the presumption is that the Bureau is already sufficiently occupied.

In order to clearly indicate the impracticability of an attempt to transfer the forest reserves from the Interior to the Agricultural Department, it may be well to state some facts relative to the forest reserves of the country. There are now 41 forest reserves in the United States, with an area of a little over 46,000,000 acres. Upon these forest reserves are located thousands of persons living on unperfected entries made under the land laws of the United States, as well as many persons occupying deeded land. All of the reserves are open to entry under the mineral laws of the United States, and upon many of them prospecting, the staking of claims, the making of mineral entries, and the prosecution of mining industries is being carried on continuously. Lands within the limits of these reserves claimed or owned by private parties may be exchanged for any surveyed nonmineral land on the public domain, and under the law providing for these lieu selections, as they are called, the owners of over three-quarters of a million acres of land within forest reserves have relinquished the same to the Government, made lieu selections elsewhere therefor, and with a few exceptions no decision with regard to the validity of these transfers and lieu selections has been reached by the General Land Office.

When we take into consideration, then, the fact that every acre within all of the forest reserves of the United States may be located, claimed, and, if mineral in character, entered under the mineral-land laws; that in some of the reservations nearly half of the land is in private ownership and a valid base for a lieu selection, and that upon all of them there are a considerable number of settlers, in some cases, like the Black Hills forest reserve in Wyoming and South Dakota, the reserve being quite thickly settled and containing a number of cities and towns, it will be readily understood how important are the public land and legal questions appertaining to forest reserves and how very large would be the jurisdiction over these reserves of the Interior Department even after the transfer of partial jurisdiction contemplated by this bill was consummated.

The transfer of these reserves to the Department of Agriculture would necessitate a largely increased number of officers for their protection and administration. Last year there were employed on the forest reserves several hundred rangers besides superintendents, supervisors, and inspectors, and it has been estimated that for the coming year there will be employed 7 superintendents, 40 supervisors, 4 inspectors, and 480 rangers, or 531 unclassified positions to be transferred if the reserves were transferred to the Agricultural Department.

In addition to these persons directly employed in connection with the reserves, the Interior Department has a large number of special agents, whose duty it is to investigate and report upon questions of trespass upon the public domain, both in and out of forest reserves, and if the reserves were transferred to the Agricultural Department, inasmuch as these men could not be transferred by reason of their duties connected with the unreserved part of the public domain, it would be necessary for the Agricultural Department to have an equal number of special agents to attend to the cases of trespass on forest reserves, thus duplicating the service, leading to friction and conflict of authority, and inasmuch as the timbered area of the country is very largely outside of forest reserves and ordinarily does not coincide with forest-reserve boundaries, but often extends for many miles over the public domain, questions relating to forest fires and trespass in the same region would often be partly in the jurisdiction of two sets of Government officers—one controlling within, the other without, the forest reserves.

At the present time the Interior Department, having charge of the preservation of the forests on the unreserved public lands as well as within the forest reserves, is enabled to provide for the cooperation of its officers in the prevention of depredation and of destruction by fire of timber both within and without forest reserves, but under the plan proposed two different departments of the Government would have charge—one on either side of the forest-reserve boundary line. That the cooperation now possible, with all the timber on the public domain under the charge of one department, would be impossible with this divided jurisdiction goes without saying.

As the transfer of the reserves would require an additional force of special agents, it would also require the establishment within the Agricultural Department of a legal bureau, inasmuch as there would be constantly arising questions relative to trespass, violation of the laws, rules, and regulations; and inasmuch as the Agricultural Department has now no legal bureau, it would be necessary to establish such a bureau and confer upon it jurisdiction over these matters in order to properly administer the reserves. Timber tresspass cases, unlawful inclosures, etc., can not be prosecuted without legal officers; the Interior Department has them, the Agricultural Department has not.

The rights of individuals upon the reserves relative to the free use of timber, the privilege of grazing, etc., depend largely upon the question of the bona fide character of claims held within the reserves, and in making investigations relative to the right of persons to establish and maintain themselves in reserves the validity of entries must first be considered. These questions could only be decided by the Interior Department, and therefore under the proposed bill we would have the spectacle of the officers of one department unable to enforce their own rules and regulations except by reference to another department as to the status of the parties in question and their rights under the law.

Scattered throughout the region in which the forest reserves are located are the United States land offices of the Interior Department, presided over by a register and a receiver, two officers appointed by the President, exercising quasi-judicial functions, to whom are referred in the first instance all land questions arising upon the public domain within or without forest reserves.

In addition to this, the receiver receives and is the custodian of all the moneys now received from the disposal of public lands as well as from fines, settlements, and sales of timber within forest reserves. The bill under consideration provides that all such moneys shall be received by an officer of the Department of Agriculture, and as it is necessary that there should be a bonded officer in the vicinity of the reserves to fulfill the duties in this regard of the receivers of public moneys, this provision of the bill alone would necessitate the appointment of a large number of additional officers as receivers of public moneys for the Agricultural Department. If there were only 1 for every 2 reserves there would be 20, and at the salary paid receivers of the general land offices their salaries alone would be $60,000 for work now performed by registers and receivers without additional cost to the Government.

But the plea is made in extenuation that not all of the reserves can, under the provisions of the bill, immediately pass under the Department of Agriculture, and therefore there will not be so much additional expense and additional friction as there might be if all the reserves passed under the Department of Agriculture. It is true the bill provides that the President shall transfer the reserves only when it shall be certified to him by the Secretary of the Interior that the boundaries thereof have been fully examined and are deemed to be substantially the permanent boundaries. If there is any reason why the forest reserves should pass from the Department which must necessarily continue to control with regard to all of the land and legal questions, even after the attempted transfer is made, those reasons would apply with practically equal force to all of the reserves.

Among the least important of all questions connected with the reserves are those of the elimination therefrom or the addition thereto of small tracts of land, and there is scarcely a reserve with regard to which any man can now intelligently say that its boundaries are substantially the proper permanent boundaries, and nothing but a much more careful examination than has ever been made of the regions adjoining the forest reserves of the country can determine that fact; but it is assumed that there may be some reserves with regard to which the boundaries may be settled with reasonable permanency, and the bill proceeds on the assumption that this is a particularly important matter and necessarily indicates a distinctive class of reserves, whereas, as a matter of fact, the question as to whether or no certain lands should or should not remain in or be included within a reserve is about the last question which should govern in a matter of this sort.

The assumption in the past that the permanent marking of the boundaries of the forest reserves was a particularly important matter has led to large unnecessary outlays on the part of the Government for special and expensive surveys which may become useless and misleading, as the reserve boundaries are changed from time to time. In practically every instance the boundaries of reserves coincide with the public-land survey boundaries, and they should in every case. Where the boundary lines have been surveyed the forest-reserve officer could readily trace and plainly mark the lines, and where the surveys have not been extended they should be in the usual way, by contract under the General Land Office.

The bill, then, contemplates two entirely distinct forest-reserve administrations in the country, one under the Interior Department and one under the Agricultural Department; each with its own rangers, special agents, superintendents, supervisors; each with its own system of rules and regulations; and, still further complicating this expensive and impracticable dual arrangement, the Interior Department would still have jurisdiction on all the reserves of the numerous public-land and legal questions.

Reference has heretofore been made to the fact that it is urged that because the Agricultural Department has a Bureau of Forestry it should administer the forests reserves. This might naturally lead to an inquiry as to why a bureau was not established in the Interior Department, which has to do with not only 46,000,000 acres of reserves, their policing, protection from fire, sale of timber, etc., but also the care and protection of the forests widely scattered over all parts of the public domain, rather than in a Department which had no forests or forested areas to administer or control.

In the Interior Department there does not seem to have been any ambition to create new bureaus with high-salaried officers, but rather a desire to economically administer the laws relative to the protection of public timber on and off the forest reserves. With all of the great responsibilities in these matters of the Interior Department, all of this work was carried on until the 1st of March, 1891, in the special-service division of the General Land Office, a division which, before it was given the additional responsibility of the forest reserves, was already overworked; and after the date named the forest-reserve work was undertaken and carried on, not by a bureau, but by a division, whose chief officer is paid $2,000, compared with $3,000 paid to the chief of the Bureau of Forestry of the Agricultural Department. This division—small, overworked, and not well paid—has been doing a splendid work in developing a national forestry policy, in protecting the forests on the reserves, and on the unreserved public lands as well, from destruction by fires and indiscriminate cutting; in preventing abuses of the privilege of the free use of timber by settlers; in providing for the sale of the matured products of the reserves; in controlling and limiting the grazing on reserves—in short, in the solution of the many and varied questions which have arisen in the development of a new policy relating to vast areas of woodland widely separated and with every variety of climate, topography, and condition.

It would be very strange if no mistake had been made, but it is an undisputed fact that good progress has been made in theory and in practice, and for the outlay made much good has been accomplished. It must be remembered that the policing and administration of a Territory one and one-half times as large as the State of New York and the protection of the timber on the vast area of public domain has been accomplished with an expenditure last year of less than $300,000. Many times this sum was saved by the prevention of forest fires, which happily are becoming things of the past on the forest reserves.

It should be borne in mind that the more important questions arising in connection with our forest reserves under the conditions which now exist in them are largely (1) legal questions arising in connection with the determination of settlement rights, lieu-land selections, mining claims, right of way for roads, trails, ditches, canals, telephones, etc., and all of these matters must necessarily be settled and determined by the Interior Department, the Department which is custodian of all the records, has charge of the administration of all the land laws, and has a thoroughly trained legal department.

(2) The policing and administration of the reserves, the protection of the same from destruction by fire and wasteful cutting, the regulation of grazing, of the free use of timber by settlers, the sale and disposal of matured timber; all of which matters can be as well, and most of them much better, administered by the Interior Department than by the Agricultural Department. These are all purely matters of administration which come properly within the jurisdiction of the Interior Department, and not scientific questions which might properly come under the Agricultural Department. It would be entirely a new departure to place upon the Agricultural Department legal questions and police duties.

The Bureau of Forestry of the Agricultural Department will undoubtedly find a large field for useful employment in the study of the questions of forestry as they relate to the entire country, to forested lands in private ownership, as well as those which are a part of the public domain. The study of these questions by the experts of that Bureau need not and should not interfere with the policing and administration of the forest reserves by the Interior Department. It would be strange, indeed, if the Interior Department could not with its administrative force cooperate in every proper way with the Agricultural Department, carrying out any theories of reforestation or improvements which might be suggested by the Agricultural Department, but there is no reason why a scientific bureau should absorb a practical and administrative one. No reason why a bureau of the Agricultural Department, presumably established for the purpose of exploiting theories, should be allowed to supersede a division of the Interior Department organized for and carrying on an intensely practical work.

The idea embodied in the bill of establishing by Executive order game and fish preserves with forest reserves upon the request of the governor of the State in which the said reserves are located meets with our approval. We therefore offer as a substitute for the proposed measure a bill which relates entirely to the establishment of game and fish preserves, and which is appended hereto.

FRANK W. MONDELL.
W. L. JONES.
J. W. FORDNEY.
JOHN F. SHAFROTH.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH].

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Chairman, the speech of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] consisted largely of an oration on forestry, which was very eloquent and which contained a great many good thoughts. But this bill has no relation whatever to the question of forestry. It is not a question whether we should have forest reserves. They are already established. It is not a question whether or not we are to have more forests. The Interior Department and the Agricultural Department have each their bureau covering the work of forestry; that of the Agricultural Bureau is a scientific bureau; its officers write essays and books upon forestry and conduct experiments. A very good bureau of its kind; but it has no practical experience whatever in supervising a forest reserve; whereas the bureau in the Interior Department has had the practical management of these forest reserves for ten years. This experience is valuable, and we should adhere to it.

So that this talk of the necessity for forests and the great benefit of forests has nothing whatever to do with this measure.

Everybody is in favor of forest preservation, there is no doubt of that, and consequently the opposition to this bill does not arise from that source at all.

Now, the true situation is this: There are 600,000,000 acres of public land in the United States west of the one hundredth meridian. Of that land about one-half or nearly one-half is what is termed forest lands—much of it mountain lands; sometimes small brush, sometimes small trees, grow on it; very small per cent is good for commercial purposes. It is land that has got to be taken care of just as well as the forest reserves are. Out of this land is carved a forest reserve of perhaps 10 or 15 miles square. Sometimes it is zigzag, running down a stream, being probably only a few miles in width.

The public timber lands and forest reserves abut upon each other, are contiguous to each other. A fire started on the public lands would spread to the lands that are in the reservation, or a fire started upon the reserves will go into the lands that are not reserved but are public lands, and consequently it is necessary that somebody should have the control and care of all of this land, and whenever you attempt to subdivide it you immediately get into complications which always arise from divided supervision and responsibility. Now, Mr. Chairman, the Interior Department has this supervision. The Interior Department has supervision of the timber lands, both reserved and unreserved. Certain provisions are necessary to be made, certain rules and regulations are necessary to be made, applying not to one alone but to both of them. Timber is permitted to be cut in certain instances. They permit the hauling away of the down timber, the cutting of the dead timber, and that rule applies both to the reserves and to the timber that is not in the reserves, and permits are issued by the officers of the Interior Department both to people cutting in the reserves and to people cutting out of the reserves.

That being the case, you can readily see the supervision is interwoven—the jurisdiction, the practical application, the actual work is interwoven so that whenever you attempt to segregate these matters and to say on this land certain rules shall prevail, promulgated by one Department, and on the other side of the line certain other rules prevail you immediatly get into confusion, you immediately find that the people who reside in that locality will not know what are the rules on one side or the other. For instance, an order is made that on this side sheep shall not graze, but only cattle, while upon the other side sheep are permitted to graze. Such rules are continually made by the Interior Department, which has comprehensive power and jurisdiction of the entire subject, but it would result in confusion if made by different bureaus. In my State there are six reserves, and to say that in a certain portion of one county certain rules shall prevail, and in another portion another rule, and in some other corner of the State upon a reservation certain other rules shall prevail, can result in nothing but confusion and the conflict of jurisdictions, and must of necessity result in the building up of a large bureau in each one of the Departments.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes, sir.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I have comparatively little knowledge of this subject, and I ask the question for information. Do the same regulations obtain within forest reservations now that obtain respecting the public domain outside?

Mr. SHAFROTH. There are certain general rules that prevail over it all, and then there are certain additional rules that are made for the reservations themselves.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I supposed that was the case.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That is true, but there are certain other regulations that are made.

Mr. MADDOX. Does the Secretary of the Interior want to get rid of this work?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not know. When the President suggested it, of course the Department naturally acquiesced. I have no particular love for the Interior Department and no opposition whatever to the Agricultural Department. I do not care whether you transfer the jurisdiction and control of forests or not, provided you transfer everything in connection with it and make it one entire bureau in that Department with jurisdiction over everything pertaining to the subject.

Mr. MADDOX. Is the Agricultural Department better prepared to look after it than the other?

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; I do not think so. I think the Interior Department is, by reason of having had experience, better prepared.

Mr. MADDOX. What is the real object of this bill, anyhow, if the gentleman knows?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not know that I can tell the gentleman what the real object of it is, because this provision of the bill is incorporated with another provision of the bill that has no more relation to each other than night has to day. They should never have been incorporated together. The idea of saying that the forest reserves should be transferred to the Agricultural Department and in the same bill providing the right to create in forest reserves certain game and fish preserves is irrelevant, to my mind. Now, the transfer of the reserves is the only part of the bill that I object to. I think fish and game preserves are proper in themselves.

Mr. BELL. I want to suggest to the gentleman that there is a very serious objection all around these reserves.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The game preserves?

Mr. BELL. Why, that is the worst objection they have.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Well, I did not look at it in that light. I knew of no objection there.

Mr. BELL. That means driving off the horse, the sheep, and the cow and the putting on there of the wild animals in their stead; and it reduces the value of every ranch near those reserves.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I apprehend that these fish and game reserves are not going to be very numerous, and you will find that there is a clause in the bill which says that they can not be established without the consent of the governor of the State.

I am now directing my attention to that feature of the bill which says that the bureau which exists in the Agricultural Department and which is a mere scientific bureau, that writes good essays and good books upon forestry, that that little bureau, consisting of 39 men, shall be vested with all the authority and with the practical workings of the entire forest reserves of the country.

We find in the forestry bureau of the Interior Department there are some five or six hundred men, and yet this bill is to put the five or six hundred over into the Department of the 39, and not the 39 over among the five or six hundred. It seems to me that when the men of the Interior Department have the practical experience, when they have been administering the affairs of the forest reserves for the last ten years, and have done it well, it is absolutely foolish to talk about transferring that Department to the control of men who have written learned essays upon scientific subjects of forestry.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I shall propose some amendments to this bill. In the first place, I would rather that the Forestry Bureau of the Agricultural Department should be transferred to the Forestry Bureau of the Interior Department. When that is done you will have one entire department controlling both the lands that are in the forest reserves and the public lands that are out of the reserves. If that fails, I shall offer, or someone upon this side of the question will offer, an amendment transferring the entire Land Department of the Interior to the Agricultural Department. I have no objection to the Agricultural Department, none whatever, and I am perfectly willing that they should have the control and care of the entire lands of the United States. What I object to is this dividing up, this slicing off a part and saying that one bureau or one department shall have a certain jurisdiction, limiting it to a certain line, and that beyond that line the other department shall have jurisdiction.

Mr. LACEY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes.

Mr. LACEY. Has there ever been any practical trouble found in the military reserves that have been turned over to the War Department in the administration of them by the War Department separate from the Interior Department?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Well, in the first place, in the military reserves, so far as my part of the country is concerned, there has been hardly any care of them at all. There may have been some little military reserves that received some care, but the Pikes Peak Military Reserve, which is a large one, has had no care whatever, except that a man has been stationed on top of Pikes Peak making observations. There has not been the slightest care of the reservation. There has never been a ranger or a person who has attempted to exercise jurisdiction, or stop trespasses, or care for the reserve, except from the Interior Department.

Mr. LACEY. There has been no conflict of jurisdiction.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The reason is that there was no attempt to take care of it. Now, I find that there are certain laws that exist with relation to both these classes of timber lands. A railroad is to be put through them. Some portion of it is under the regulation of the Agricultural Department, and as to the balance of the way the Interior Department has jurisdiction. There are various settlers in these forest reserves. Their possession must be preserved or destroyed under the supervision of one department, and the legal questions must be decided in another department. When a certain policy is to be adopted as to the cutting of timber, the character of timber that is to be cut, whether down timber or standing timber of certain kinds, we find that the Agricultural Department will have jurisdiction and will make recommendations; and yet, if a trespass exists, that matter must go to the Interior Department.

So nothing but confusion can result from attempting to establish a bureau which will take care of a part included in a larger part of the public lands of the United States. These forest reserves amount to about 46,000,000 acres, whereas the total acreage of public lands that are called timber lands is two to three hundred million acres. Thus the forest reserves constitute only one-sixth to one-fourth of the whole. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention to the fact that the gentleman from Iowa has said that the Interior Department is greatly crowded with work, that it is the most overburdened Department in the Government.

But, Mr. Chairman, this bill does not relieve the Interior Department hardly in the slightest of the great duty of determining the legal questions arising in forest reservations or concerning the public domain.

Take the question of mineral entry on public lands. You have a right to enter upon the forest reserves and locate a mineral claim. The right to possession and the legal questions arising as to the same are now and must even if this bill passes be determined by the Interior Department. Very little, if any, relief will be given by this bill. Every year a clash of jurisdiction in determining what the miner shall take by his location; as to how much timber he shall cut in order to properly put his mine in working order. That may be determined in one instance, perhaps, by an order from the Agricultual Department and in another by an order from the Interior Department; and if a legal question arises it goes to the Interior Department for settlement. When we take into consideration that the timber lands which are contained in the forest reserves only amount to one-sixth or to one-fourth of the timber lands outside of the reservations, and that the timber on the unreserved lands are necessary to preserve irrigation, they are not going to be disposed of.

The gentleman says the Interior Department is to sell the lands and dispose of them. But any man on the floor of this House or his son will not live long enough to see these lands disposed of, because they are a part of the public domain which can never be taken up as agricultural lands. They are not fit for agriculture, and never will be fit for anything except mining, and you can not find a mine on one acre out of 10,000. These lands are going to be held by the Government, whether they are to be forest reserves or unreserved timber lands. They serve identically the same purpose. The Government has to take care of them, and will take care of them in the future. The Interior Department will still have to preserve the timber on the great public domain not included in reservations, and consequently if this bill passes you certainly build up two bureaus—one in the Interior Department, to take care of five-sixths of the land, the title of which is going to remain in the United States for hundreds of years, and the other in the Agricultural Department, to care take of the 46,000,000 acres of land that are now in the reservations. So that it seems to be clear that by this legislation we are bound to establish two distinct bureaus, antagonistic in some respects, with conflicting jurisdiction as to many questions that will arise with relation to these reservations and public lands.

Now, it is no more necessary to preserve the timber in reserves than it is that upon the unreserved public domain. Why? Because a fire started upon the forest lands will sweep across the country and go into the reserves. The timber on both classes of lands are necessary to irrigation. In the Interior Department there are men who are charged with the duty of examining into forest fires, detecting them, and bringing prosecutions against men who negligently leave camp fires on the timber land of the public domain or who set fire willfully and maliciously to the forests.

You can readily see, as but one-sixth of the forests is to be transferred, that there will be five times as much work in this line retained in the Interior Department. This force should be greatly increased for the preservation of the timber lands of this country, for I tell you, as a matter of fact, that the regulation as to preventing cutting timber is nothing to be compared to the great question of the preservation of the forests from fire. You can have strict regulations enforced against the cutting of timber upon the reserves for eight or ten years, and then there will be a sweeping fire pass over it, and we will have wasted more timber than would have been cut for ten years. That is not only a question of the past but of to-day. There are big forest fires that have been raging in my State in the last ninety days.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that is the reason I object to the provisions of this bill transferring to the Agricultural Department a part of a bureau. It is going to make more bureaus, and they are going to conflict with each other.

Mr. DAHLE. I would like to ask the gentleman about these forest fires. Will it make any difference in regard to these fires if this bill becomes a law?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; if one Department has its officers whose duty and requirement are to put out fires wherever they occur, you can readily see that they are not going to confine their supervision to a reserve; whereas if the Agricultural Department has the supervision it will cause a number of officers to watch out only for its reserve, and the Interior Department, of necessity, will have to have men to look after the forests which are not contained within the jurisdiction of the Agricultural Department.

Mr. DAHLE. What can be done toward putting out the fires?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Well, I introduced a bill in the Fifty-fourth Congress which I tried to get through and which I thought would have a tendency to solve the question. It provided that the Government should at intervals of 10 miles clear from timber strips of a half a mile in width where no trees should be permitted to grow, and I thought that was a sufficient distance to prevent the leaping of the fire from one piece of timber to another. The committee reported the bill favorably, but I never was able to get consideration of it in the House. I think it a provision which ought to be made, and it ought to be done by one department, by one head, so that it could block out the timber lands under one general comprehensive system.

Mr. DAHLE. At present can much of anything be done toward preventing these fires?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; because there are five or six hundred men who are required to go around and put out these fires. They are called rangers; and wherever a fire occurs they are ordered to go, whether on a reserve, on the public land, anywhere these men go and put it out.

Mr. DAHLE. But do they do any good?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, yes; they do put out the fire, but the rain and change of the wind are the principal things that puts it out. They, however, often prevent the spread of fire. By watching carefully, destructive fires can be prevented. The force ought to be increased in the Interior Department; but I do not want the Agricultural Department to have one set of men and the Interior Department have another set of men, so that one man can say, It is not my duty to go over that line and stop the fire, while another says, I have nothing to do with the fires on that side of the line.

Men do not like to put themselves to any great deal of trouble, and you will find that the spirit will exist that there will be a rivalry between them as to whether the public land should require the attention of this set of men or that set of men. It will have a tendency to let a man say, "I do not care for that fire; that is another man's business." I believe that every business should be conducted as far as possible under one head. Here are 300,000,000 acres of timber land, and to say that a portion of the forest lands should be under this set of men and a portion under another jurisdiction is not wise. We do not do it in our own private affairs, and it ought not to be done under Government administration.

How much time have I remaining, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has seventeen minutes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELL].

Mr. BELL. Mr. Chairman, I shall refer to the history of these reservations and to what they are. In the first place, they were most all located without the request of anyone near their situses and without the knowledge of anybody near their locations. The greater number of them were set apart under the Administration of President Cleveland. When they were set apart everyone near them thought that they were to be new national parks. The people inquired of the Secretary of the Interior, "What are you going to do with Battle Mountain Reservation? What are you going to do with White River Reservation?" They thought that they were to be cared for and run the same as Yellowstone Park. Immediately they were informed by the Interior Department of the Government that the object was not to spend a single dollar on any of these reservations, that they would not interfere with the general range privileges.

The only thing, said the Interior Department, that we intend to do is to keep down the fires, protect the timber, etc.; that the snows may be conserved to water the country below. That was declared year in and year out to those living around these reserves.

What has been the result? The result has been that they have taken in for the White River and Battlement-Mesa reserves near me about 2,000,000 acres of ground. In the county where White River Reserve is they did not leave a place where anyone could get a load of wood or a stick of saw timber except on that reservation. They took many valleys. They took a great deal of country that had not a stick of timber on it, but they said that vegetation would keep the snow from melting, and that the reservation would be open to the settler for grazing purposes. Now, I want to suggest a thing that few of you have thought of, and that is that in the year 1901 more homesteads were proved up, on the public domain, than during any other year in the history of this Government.

Yet we talk about the public domain being exhausted. A few days ago the Commissioner of the General Land Office stood before the chairman of the committee, who presented this bill, protesting against his bill for leasing the public domain. He said: "You must not lease it; you must not interfere with it;" and he presented the figures showing that last year there were more homesteads entered than in any other year since this Government was established. When he was asked for his reason he said that the good land had all been exhausted; that home hunters were more numerous than ever before since the Government was first founded; they went forth searching for suitable locations, and if they found poor land near a range, with a little stream of water, they planted their homes there.

They did this, the Commissioner said, because they knew that there was a great Government range adjoining that poor land; they could get a few cows and could have the benefit of the public range, and therefore manage to make an existence. But, said he, if you begin to lease the public lands you stop this settlement. "I ask you," he said, "not to lease this land. It will stop settlement."

Now, I want to say his argument will apply to these timber reserves as forcibly as it did or does to the leasing of the public domain. And, Mr. Chairman, the sole purpose of this bill is not to transfer the control of these reserves to the Agricultural Department; it is to build up a lot of English game preserves in this country—to drive out the cow and the horse and the sheep from these 46,000,000 acres, or certain portions of them, and to fix up preserves for game and fish for the sportsmen. It is to subvert the necessities of the poor to the sports of the rich.

Now, I am interested in this particular matter, for in my district is located the point where it is proposed to make a game preserve of a million acres. The intention unquestionably is to take the White River Reservation of over a million acres and convert it into a game preserve for the sportsmen. The minute you do that you will reduce by 50 per cent the value of every ranch that borders on that reservation.

You can not keep game on one of these reservations and allow cattle and horses to run upon it. You can not keep them on those reserves and allow the cowboy to ride through. You must make the reserve exclusive; and in my judgment there is not a man, not a woman, not a child living adjacent to one of those reservations who will not be up in arms whenever you begin to drive out the horse and the cow and the sheep who took land which was absolutely worthless except for the privilege of a public range. You purpose converting this into a public game preserve in order that a lot of men with leisure to spend pleasantly may come out and hunt, fish, and revel in those mountains.

Mr. Chairman, there is much in what my colleague [Mr. SHAFROTH] said about this divided authority. When I am at home I look almost every time I step out of my door to the Battlement Mesa Reservation, one of the greatest mountains in the entire Rocky Mountain chain. Throughout last summer I sat at the table with a ranger three times a day; I talked with him frequently. He had one fire on that reserve last summer. What did he do? He gathered 30 men and a number of livery teams and went up there and put it out; and he did not stay there a single minute after he put it out. He never went up there until he saw the smoke rise. He watched a stretch of country over 200 miles in length from the town of Montrose.

He was the only man in the Uncompahgre Valley on such duties. He did not need to go to any portion of that range until he saw indications of fire. He had two fires—possibly more; I remember two. He was not within 30 miles of either when they started; but in that clear atmosphere he could see the smoke easily for 30 or 40 miles as soon as the fire was started. He put out one fire on the public domain to my knowledge, at least 50 miles from the one on the reserve. A land office is there. The land officers have in view all the time the preservation of timber. The timber agents of the Interior Department are upon the field constantly.

I want further to have it understood that these reserves were not set apart for the commercial value of the timber. Bear in mind, where I live there are 2,000,000 acres in two reserves. On these reserves the timber is a spongy pine and hemlock, which no man undertakes to build a nice house of. You talk about this timber as if it had a great commercial value. But it is generally scrub timber. These reservations have been set apart at the head of the great streams, some of them pretty near as high as the timber will grow, and the timber is, as I have said, inferior in kind and quality. This mountain pine is soft, spongy, and there is no body to it, and where I live, surrounded by this timber on all sides, we do not offer to clapboard, floor, or ceil a house with that timber; it is not fit for it. The principal part of our timber for building houses is shipped from Georgia, or Texas, or Oregon. The timber growing in our region was set apart, as we were informed, to preserve the snowfall, to supply the rivers in the bottoms late in the summer, and for no other purpose.

Now, let us not get it into our minds that we preserve these for the commercial value of the timber or for the beauty of it. If so, the nearest reservation to me would be worthless, and we ought to abandon it now, because no man can get a stick of timber from the reservation. Why, it is almost impossible to get up there at all. It is on an elevated mountain that you can stand off and look at 75 miles away, and which looks as if it were but a few miles distant. There is no way to get timber from there; there is no way to get it off the mountain. It is absolutely worthless except for the purpose of maintaining the snow fall. Now, that is all we want it for. That was all it was intended these reservations should be set apart for.

Now, it would be an absolute fraud upon the settlers that this Government induced to go and locate around those reserves, to now say that it will convert this reserve into a game preserve. Let me give you a little illustration. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] had before his committee almost constantly for two winters here an organization trying to rent a million acres of ground in New Mexico for the purpose of establishing a buffalo herd. That organization remained here and lobbied, and it is my understanding the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] thought that they ought to have it. I heard a man stand at the end of the table in his committee and say to that committee, "I will give you $25,000 in cash for what these men ask for; give me the lease that these men ask for, and I will give you $25,000 in cash."

He stood here and begged and pleaded for a reserve. I want to say to you, pass this bill and I know that the sporting elements will be before the governor of the States asking that he ask that some of these reserves be set apart for fish, for game, for hunting purposes. The cowboy, the sheepman, and the horseman, who located there under an invitation from this Government with the understanding that they would have the privilege of that range, and located for that purpose alone, must be driven out. Now, is it not remarkable that the men who signed this minority report are men from right around those reserves? Mr. JONES, from Washington, Mr. MONDELL, from Wyoming, Mr. SHAFROTH, from Colorado, and the other gentleman from Michigan. They know the conditions. They know that in those States this means ruin to those settled around the reserves. I admit that we have more lions, more elks, more deer in the White River timber reserve than can be found in any other like country in America.

Mr. LACEY. Will the gentleman permit a question at this point?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BELL. Yes; certainly.

Mr. LACEY. Is it not true that all the gentlemen who signed the minority report favor the bill with the single exception of the transfer to the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. BELL. I do not know what they do, but I want to say that if they do——

Mr. LACEY. That is what they say in their report.

Mr. BELL. If they do favor it, they do not understand in Colorado the sentiment of the people surrounding the reserves. Around the Battle Mountain Reserve, near where I live, are 10,000 people settled. Ten thousand people surround that reserve. Around the White River Reserve they are dependent on the use of the reserve, because it takes in all the timber and the intervening parks. The settlers have complained from the day the reservation was set apart. They have insisted that it be limited. They have been insisting that the parks be taken out. There has not been a Congress since that we have not been flooded by petitions from everybody around that reserve saying that the reserve as it now stands ruins an entire county.

They have been quieted by the assurance from the Secretary of the Interior that the only disturbance would be that they would protect it from fire and timber destruction. I want to say to our friends who are so anxious for reserves, if they insist upon these continued encroachments they will find every man from the Western domain coming on here with one voice and asking to abolish everyone within the limits of these States.

This is an all-important matter where I live. We are located right in the heart of the Rocky Mountains. An acre of level land where I live is like a speck on the map of the State, compared with the mountain ranges. Nearly all the country is mountainous. There are two great mountain ranges, rising as high as 14,000 feet and upward above sea level. These ranges are parallel, and they are now and then bisected by cross ranges. Between them you will find little parks. That is the condition of the country.

The region was settled, not for agriculture, because you can not grow things there of any consequence to export. The settlement was for the purpose of engaging in the stock-raising industry. A man will locate upon a piece of land, if he can find a stream, with 1 acre or 3 acres or 5 acres or 10 acres of level ground, with the understanding that he can have a little bunch of cows and let them run in the mountain ranges. It is true that no one acre furnishes much feed, but where there are 100,000 or 500,000 acres of mountains to 1 acre of valley it gives a man a chance to have his cattle range over a great area of country.

It is the most common thing for a man to have his cattle as far as 40 and 50 miles from the home camp. He has some advantages there. The mountain ranges fence in the stock. They can not get out unless they walk a railroad track down some stream, and they never do that. This country was settled because of these facilities. The White River can not grow a farm product that it can export, but Congress and the Government invited settlers to go upon the White River and locate the land. They have gone and located all around the head of White River. They have located there for stock-raising purposes. They have located there with the understanding that they can use these ranges. After they got there this reserve was set apart, never being surveyed, but the lines being drawn in the city of Washington.

One of the main objects of this bill is and will be to convert that reserve, not into a conservator of snow, but into an English game reserve. It would make a sportsman's paradise. Ah, but the gentleman says, we will have to get the consent of the governor of your State. That reserve is 250 miles from the capital. It is an extreme corner of the State. The capital and Colorado Springs and other places have many men full of sporting proclivities. Those men will gather in and about the capital and say to the governor of the State, "Yes, make this a game preserve. Let us raise buffalo, let us raise deer, let us raise game on that park, and we will go down there in the hot weather and kill mountain lions and deer, and we will fish." You may bring all these things about, but I want to say that if you do you will squeeze 50 per cent out of the value of every ranch located around that great reserve. Do you want to do that? Is it the business of the Government to do that?

Are you so interested in having a game preserve and a fish preserve put upon us against our interests, against our protests, that you will ask it? Ask it at the expense of the hardy, poor, and forlorn settlers who have gone into that rugged country and reclaimed it? I do not believe you possess such hardihood.

I am talking earnestly, because when at home I sit under the very dome of one of these reserves. The promise was made to us that they should not interfere detrimentally with us. The promise was made to us that there would be no improvements made. We have had innumerable assurances to this effect. We have also had verbal promises time and again. Let them exist with the original object, to conserve the snow for the water supply, and be limited to the timber and there will be no objection; but you convert them into something else and you perpetrate an injustice.

I am sorry if the minority of the committee think the people do not object to the fish and game preserve feature. I know that in Colorado, and especially in my district, we want none of your game preserves; we want none of your fish preserves; we want no rendezvous for idle sportsmen; at least we do not want to drive out the cow and the sheep and the horse and to destroy the value of the land that was located and paid for there with the understanding that the stock of the settler should range on this part of the public domain for the purpose of entertaining a sporting army.

This bill is ill conceived. It is gotten up by men 2,000 miles away from the situs of the land. It is not in the interest of commercial timber; it is not in the interest of ornamental timber. This bill is for the purpose merely of converting these great areas of land into a sportsman's paradise at the expense of the pioneers who have reclaimed that country. I protest against it, and I do not believe you want it. Why, my friends, what will the forester do there? It is unfortunate, probably, that we got a forestry association so quickly, before we were ready for it. They could not plant a tree on one of these reservations and make it grow.

No tree will grow there except the scrub pine and quaking aspen, and, as I said, the only enemy of that country is the fire which comes there periodically. These men put them out now and then; sometimes they do not. If anybody is interested in preserving that timber it is we who have bought the ground below and want to use the water it conserves and want the game preserved; but we do not want to drive out the domestic animals for the purpose of preserving this for a game preserve. I think it will be unfortunate if you pass such a bill. I have no idea it will become a law, because the Senate of the United States, where they have a habit of considering these things for a considerable length of time, will have to wait till the people are heard from.

Now, I have said all I wish to say. I do not doubt the good faith of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY], the chairman of the committee. He is too anxious to benefit us in that far-away country. If he would only go out and live there and stand some of the deprivations and hardships that those persons undergo, he would know better how to look after their comfort. He would sympathize with their necessities rather than for a few sportsmen that come out thirty days when the sun is high and when there is no hardship to undergo.

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Chairman, proceeding in my own right, I wish first to send to the Clerk's desk and have read a part of the President's message.

The Clerk read as follows:

At present the protection of the forest reserves rests with the General Land Office, the mapping and description of their timber with the United States Geological Survey, and the preparation of plans for their conservative use with the Bureau of Forestry, which is also charged with the general advancement of practical forestry in the United States. These various functions should be united in the Bureau of Forestry, to which they properly belong. The present diffusion of responsibility is bad from every standpoint. It prevents that effective cooperation between the Government and the men who utilize the resources of the reserves, without which the interests of both must suffer. The scientific bureaus generally should be put under the Department of Agriculture. The President should have by law the power of transferring lands for use as forest reserves to the Department of Agriculture. He already has such power in the case of lands needed by the Departments of War and the Navy.

Mr. KLEBERG. Now, Mr. Chairman, I heartily concur in the recommendation of the President of the United States. I do not often agree with a Republican President, but I think that this is one of the fine recommendations in that great message which the President has delivered to the Congress of the United States. The fact is emphasized there that this Forestry Bureau should be where it properly belongs—in the Department of Agriculture. The Forestry Bureau in the Department of the Interior is there more especially for the protection of forests against fire. The fact is apparent and is known to everybody who is acquainted with the subject, that the depredations which are committed upon the forestry grounds are not only by people who cut trees and possibly permit the fires to get out in the waste, but by the raids of the cattle men and the sheep men who denude the ground of all the grasses and the young growth of trees.

I think possibly one of the strongest arguments that could be made for this bill and for this intrinsic and well-thought-out policy is the argument made by my friend from Colorado. I think by the presentation of the facts that we have had from him there can be left no doubt that under the present system large herds of cattle and sheep are permitted to graze without let or hindrance in these forest reserves, which not only crowd out the game and wild animals there, but will possibly finally exterminate them and denude the soil of those native grasses to such a degree that floods and rains will go down and fill up the streams with silt and sand and utterly destroy the springs from which the streams are now fed.

The gentleman speaks of White River in his State and the necessity his people have for the use of the water there. Well, I predict if this predatory use is made of the large forest reserves for many more years that the river will be filled up with silt; that the forest which is there now will possibly soon cease. The old trees are of not much value, but all the young growth, the young trees, should be protected and fostered by scientific culture and management. I therefore think that this argument he has made presents the strongest reasons for protecting these forest reserves. I think it is of the utmost importance that their predatory use should be stopped by the Government. I do not mean to say that these people should not be allowed in a reasonable manner the use of some of the native grasses there, and the use of some of the trees under proper supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture; not by any means. But the argument of the gentleman, I think, discloses the principal opposition to this bill, for all they are after is free grass and free timber.

While I am not here to encroach upon the rights of any people in the use of the grass and the timber in a legitimate way, I do not think that this great body ought to stand up and suffer the utter destruction of these forest reserves, of the native growth of those forests, and thereby, possibly, not only destroy them, but actually dry up the rivers and the streams. These forest reserves ought to be placed, as intended in this bill, under a body composed of scientific men, such as we have now in the Forestry Bureau of the Agricultural Department. It is a part of agriculture to save the trees, and the management of the forests under the Agricultural Department is not only the preservation of the trees but the natural reservoir of water which is necessary for the adjacent arid or semiarid lands; and yet, if we are to follow the argument of the gentleman, why we will expose them all to the predatory use of some people who happened to be near by, who could possibly drive their herds promiscuously over the lands, and may use some of the timber.

I think it is high time, as has been pointed out by the Chief Executive, to preserve these forest reserves and to preserve with them the natural game that live within their bounds, and thereby to have the nucleus to restock the adjacent country. The idea of saying that this will be a game reserve for the nabobs, for gentlemen who live abroad, is to beg the question. The idea at the foundation of this bill is to preserve the public forests and preserve the streams and to place forestry under scientific and practical management at the same time. There is not a civilized nation in the world that has not a department of forestry; and it is high time that this great United States should preserve its forests, at least as far as the Government forests are concerned.

Now, I am aware that time is passing and that we should consider this bill by sections. I wish to express my full approval of it and hope that gentlemen on this side will support it heartily. I will now yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS].

Mr. LACEY. Before the gentleman from New York begins I will ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the gentleman's remarks general debate shall close.

Mr. CANNON. Does my friend think that he can finish the bill to-night?

Mr. LACEY. No; but we can get to reading it by sections. I do not know whether we could get through with it to-night or not.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I want a little time.

Mr. LACEY. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. A short time.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, I will withdraw my request.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I should say nothing about a bill which relates to a district so remote from where I live were it not for the remarks made by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELL]. I have been out in this part of the country a good deal, and I think I can give, for the information of the committee, some facts as to the effects of the forest reserve quite as well, perhaps, as the gentleman from Colorado.

He made an appeal to the members of the committee, saying that one object of the bill is to build up game reservations for English nabobs and the rich men of the East to shoot in at the expense of the poor and forlorn settler that wanted to use this land in the forest reserves.

Now, Mr. Chairman, several times—last fall, for instance—I was out for weeks in the State of Wyoming in the forest reserves, and I wish to appeal to the committee in behalf of the poor and forlorn settler to extend the size and the usefulness of the reserve. When I was out there many of the poor and forlorn settlers, as the gentleman calls them, talked about these cattlemen, but not as the gentleman from Colorado has spoken of them. They called them cattle barons, who drove their cattle and sheep all over the land, to the destruction of smaller owners.

What are the effects of the forest reserve? Take the Jackson Hole district, where I was last fall. There are, perhaps, 250 men there, or six or seven hundred people. I wish to state, Mr. Chairman, that if the forest reserve was destroyed, if the cattle were allowed to range over that country and drive out all of the game, not one man in Jackson Hole would live there. There is no better class of men in the United States. They have their little places of 40 or 50 acres of pretty poor land and some of them one or two cattle, and these small men are not troubled by forest reserve. Every one of them pieces out his living honestly and properly from the use of the land made by those attracted to it because it contains game and other objects of amusement.

I will wager that last fall from seventy-five to one hundred thousand dollars of good cold money of the United States went into the Jackson Hole district from men who came there because the Government preserved the forests, and not one single dollar of that would have gone in if the forest reserves were destroyed. These men are small, not big, cattle owners, and they are thus enabled to earn a livelihood. Have they not just as much right to the attention and support of the Congress of the United States as are the men who want to destroy the forest reserves that they may have their cattle fed free? Is there, Mr. Chairman, any industry in the United States that would have the audacity to come before this Congress and ask what? The right to have the Government furnish them free of charge for all time the wherewithal for their industry? How are these small people, these poor forlorn settlers, in whose behalf the gentleman from Colorado speaks, how are they affected? I heard the gentleman from Colorado say, "Will Congress, by this legislation, keep this land for the benefit of the rich men and take it away from the struggling men that want their cattle and sheep on these reservations?"

Now, when I was there last fall they began to drive sheep over into the Jackson Hole country. Those sheep, as everyone knows, are owned almost uniformly by great corporations, by men of great wealth, who send their sheep there to graze free on Government land. Now, where those sheep go they so denude the soil that there is nothing left for the game, and nothing for anyone else. The people with whom I was were all small people—poor people, settlers—having 40 or 50, or possibly at the outside 160 acres, each. And they did what was not perhaps the right thing for them to do. But out West, where a man feels that his livelihood is at stake, that the existence of his family is at stake, and that the courts are a great distance away, he often takes the law into his own hands; and those Jackson Hole people when I was there said: "If the sheep come into the Jackson Hole and graze upon the forest reserves, it means starvation for every one of us." They said: "We have fought before, and we will fight now." What they did was not perhaps right; but the circumstance shows how the poor settlers feel out there.

Mr. CANNON. Does either the defeat or the enactment of this bill mean any change as to the forest reserves?

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I do not know how that may be. I should not have said one word about this bill—for I know nothing about the question of overlapping powers between the Department of the Interior and the Department of Agriculture—had not the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELL] risen here and said that behind this bill is the intention of preserving and extending the forest reserves, and his entire speech, as gentlemen of the committee will remember, was against the forest reserves and their effects. For this reason, and for this alone, I have risen to speak in behalf of this bill as if it is, as the gentleman from Colorado says, a bill to extend the forest reserves. If that is the object, I am in favor of it with all my might.

Mr. BELL. The gentleman misunderstood me altogether.

Mr. PERKINS. I heard what the gentleman said about the forest reserves keeping out the cattle and the sheep.

Mr. BELL. No; I said that I was against this bill because it proposes to convert, as I understand, a forest reserve in my district of about 1,000,000 acres into a game and fish preserve and to drive out the cattle and horses—I was about to say the sheep, but they never allow sheep on those reserves.

Mr. PERKINS. The sheep men want to get their sheep in, but they do not succeed because the sheep are shot on the way.

Mr. BELL. The regulations of the Interior Department have never allowed sheep on the reservations in Colorado. The objection I make is that you are going to change the character of the forest reserves into game and fish preserves; and I object to this, especially as to the White River Reserve, because if that were done it would ruin one county of my State.

Mr. PERKINS. I can not speak about the White River Reserve, because I never was there; but I know that where I have been—and I assume the situation is somewhat the same elsewhere—the desire is to bring the cattle into the forest reserves that they may feed on Government land free of expense to the owners. That is the policy pursued by the great companies owning cattle there.

Now, the gentleman from Colorado knows and I know and everybody knows that the cattle ownership there is, for the most part, on an enormous scale. The cattle-owning companies are, in their way, as formidable as the beef-packing companies, and they are the people who insist on having their cattle live free upon this Government land, though they know the necessary result is that it drives away all forms of game and deprives the settlers of a means of livelihood, although they are as 100 to 1 compared to these cattle owners.

Mr. BELL. The gentleman will allow me to suggest that since the settlement of the valleys in Colorado there has not been, I think, a single large herd of cattle in that State. If there has been any such, I do not know it.

Mr. PERKINS. There are such in Wyoming; there is no doubt about that.

Mr. BELL. The difficulty in my country has been about wintering them out there.

Mr. PERKINS. I have met a good many of the men out there who are small owners; I talked with them last fall when I was there; and they are unanimous in thinking that their interests demand the preservation and extension of the system of forest reserve and keeping out the cattle and sheep. As I was about to say when interrupted, so strong is this feeling in the Jackson Hole territory that these men went out and shot the sheep that came in there. Undoubtedly this was a lawless act.

But when anyone gets up in Congress and says that we are required to allow these sheep and cattle to range through the Government lands, when I have seen with my own eyes settlers, poor men, small owners, go out with their rifles and take their lives in their hands and put the law in defiance to keep the sheep off, they will not get my vote in Congress for any bill the object of which is in any way to diminish or lessen the usefulness and the extension of the forest reserves; and if my friend from Iowa [Mr. LACEY], the chairman having charge of this bill, says that it will assist in developing and preserving the system of forest reserves, then I will vote for it, believing that in so doing I am standing for the interests of by far the great majority of the people in the district affected by it.

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Chairman, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I regard this as one of the most important bills which has appeared before this Congress, not because of its immediate effect, but because of the remote effect, or, rather, because of the remote effects to ensue from not passing it. Every enlightened nation on this globe, so far as I know, has national forest reserves. The objection to the nonprotection of the forests at the head of the great water courses of a country are patent, whether judged a priori by the theories of scientists, or a posteriori by the experience of mankind.

The objections, from the standpoint of agriculture and of navigation, of the nonprotection of forests have been explained to the world again and again. I am not going to enter into that here, further than to say simply this, that when the forests are kept in their pristine vigor upon the mountains and hills at the heads of the great water courses the natural herbage and the roots of the young and tender trees act as a sponge, or, rather, make the soil act as a sponge. The water goes down into the soil, feeding the subterranean streams going out through them into water courses. When the timber is destroyed and the natural herbage and young shoots are destroyed and only the old trees or nothing is left, whether the destruction takes place by fire, by the ax, or by sheep grazing, some things follow of the very utmost evil tendency.

In the first place, the soil ceases to act as a sponge and take up the water as it falls, and the water runs down the sides, forming gullies, and making immense denudations and erosions, first, filling up with silt the water courses below, rendering the streams that were formerly navigable nonnavigable, and secondly, as a consequence of filling up the bottoms, the streams are caused to overflow their banks and destroy all the agricultural lands upon their sides, or at any rate, making cropping such lands unprofitable or uncertain.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Your explanation and your statement are very fine, but as a matter of fact will not forests be preserved, no matter whether they remain in the Interior Department or the Agricultural Department?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, the forests will not be preserved whether they remain in the Interior or the Agricultural Department, and now I am going to prove it. We have now pending before this Congress a bill which would not be here but for the fact that forests have not been preserved. There is a bill pending here now for the United States Government to spend somewhere between five and ten millions of dollars to buy from private ownership the lands in the Appalachian chain through western North Carolina, East Tennessee, the Virginias, north Georgia, and north Alabama for the purpose of trying to remedy the very evil which has come from the neglect to preserve the forests at the head waters of the great system which we call the Mississippi Valley, the Monongahela, the Allegheny, the Ohio, the Tennessee, the Cumberland, and all the way down; and I have no doubt of the fact that if the forests had been preserved in the beginning, the navigation upon those upper streams would have been preserved in so much better condition than it is now that the United States Government would have saved on river and harbor bills five times the amount that is asked to be appropriated for the purchase of these forests.

Now, I am not expressing an opinion upon the Appalachian Forest Reserve park bill, because it is a totally different thing to buy lands from private ownership for the purpose of establishing a forest reserve and to take the lands which you already have, which the Government owns, with which it can exercise every act of ownership, and, taking "a stitch in time" so as to "save nine," prevent by reservation and practical, scientific management the necessity of ever having to consider the question as regards the forests at the head of the water courses that are fed from the Rocky Mountains. The constitutionality of the scheme of buying lands for forest reserves has been questioned. I do not say it has been questioned by me, but the constitutionality of the Government dealing with the forest lands which it already owns, for the purpose of keeping a sufficient acreage of them in reserve to help the great causes of navigation and agriculture both, can not be disputed.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I think that a great deal of the opposition to this bill grows out of a confusion of terms. Men are confusing forests and forestry. They are confusing a forest and forest reserve. Hence my friend complains that all of the "forestry" questions are not transferred to the Agricultural Department by this bill. He is mistaken. This bill does transfer all forestry questions and all forest reserves, although it does not transfer all woodlands and all forests. It is by no means necessary to keep in reserve all the woods of a country, and those woods and forests which are not to be put in reserve are and ought to be kept in the public domain subject to entry, preemption, or sale for agricultural and other purposes, and therefore under the management of the Land Office in the Interior Department. So that this bill, and very properly, too, does not transfer forests, but only such parts of forests as are well to be set aside as forest reserves.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of this bill for another reason, and a reason which, I think, ought to appeal to every member of the House interested in the question of economy. As it is at present a great deal of duplication of work is going on which will be saved under this bill. And there again, in trying to answer that argument, some little confusion has arisen. One gentleman said in the debate the other day that the Interior Department had "forestry men" not only in the forest reserves but in the forests outside of the forest reserves. That is a mistake, Mr. Chairman. The Interior Department has rangers in the forest reserves. Outside of the forest reserves it has nothing but special agents, and the business of those special agents is merely to prevent fires upon the public domain and to prevent the violation of the laws of the United States as regards the public domain. They are in no sense foresters. They are not by any means in number equal to the forest rangers, nor do they by any means bring about the same expense, nor is it by any means the same class of work which they do. These special agents are men who ferret out evidence concerning people who have violated the laws, and of course the protection of the public domain not in forest reserves, and the whole detective and law work to be done in connection with this protection, are questions for the Interior Department to consider.

Now, Mr. Chairman, just one other instance of the importance of this. Take another great valley, another great water system in this country, the Hudson, and its feeders and tributaries. The State of New York, after permitting for years destruction by fire and by grazing and by cutting ad libitum, found it necessary to institute a forest reserve in the Adirondacks for the protection of the agriculture of the State of New York, and for the protection of the navigation of its waters. The State being unable to get the Federal Government to do it, did it of its own accord, and now spends about $4,000,000 a year in keeping up that work.

Now, it can not be possible that Germany, France, the State of New York, and everybody is mistaken, and that this is a question of small importance. When you come to consider the interests of our grandchildren and great-grandchildren, it is a question of the very utmost importance, and it will not do to put it off until they come to consider it for themselves, either; because by that time it will be too late; the erosion, the denudation, the filling up of the streams, and the destruction of the valleys all will have taken place, and it will be too late to remedy the evil. This is a thing which can be prevented, but which after it has once happened can not well be remedied, though perhaps it can be prevented from growing worse.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does not the gentleman recognize that this talk about the Appalachian and Hudson River reserves is not at all applicable to this question, because the reserves on the public lands have been marked out and determined, and are going to remain whether the Agricultural Department has the care of them or whether the Interior Department has the care of them.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Well, I will answer that. One of the very reasons why I want this bill passed is this: Agriculture is but an incident to the management of the forestry question in the Interior Department. The interests of agriculture will be the object when the Agricultural Department comes to designate and manage the forestry reserves. They will have in control and management men who have been trained as foresters, not trained as mere special agents; men who will know just how to mark the trees to be cut, just how much cutting to permit, just how much grazing should be permitted, and still at the same time keep the forests at the head of the streams what God evidently intended them to be—an ever-living and ever self-renewing thing.

Now, the Interior Department has demonstrated already that it is either incapable or unwilling to do this work properly. I think it was not unwilling, but it was because the main purpose of the Interior Department was totally another purpose. The Interior Department itself recognizes the superior fitness of the Agricultural Department for the work, and recommends the passage of this bill and the consequent transfer. When it is handed over to the Agricultural Department, the object of the Agricultural Department will be to prevent the very evils of which I have spoken, and in order to prevent them, to do the very things which I have mentioned, and not merely to detect and prevent depredations.

Forestry is everywhere regarded as an agricultural science. It is akin to agriculture in its every lineament. There is not a thing that the forester studies in regard to forest reservations at the head of the great water courses which is not studied and worked out with a view to the ultimate benefit of agriculture in the valleys and upon the slopes. Now, the Interior Department can not do that. The Interior Department would have to change its entire personnel before it could do that sort of work.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I would like the gentleman to yield to me for a moment. These forest reserves are on high mountains, mostly in the Rocky Mountains. If the gentleman has ever been on one, he will find that over three-fourths of the trees grow out of crevices in the rocks that would be impossible to support a system of raising timber like you see done in Germany and in France. These places are eight, ten, and twelve thousand feet above the sea level, and they are under conditions and of a character that is not like those places where timber can be raised for commercial purposes.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I think that the authorities, when they come to mark out their forest reserves, are hardly going to mark them out above the timber line on the mountain tops. They will be within the timber line, then timber will grow on them. At any rate, they will not mark out a forest reserve where no forest can grow.

Mr. SHAFROTH. You will find that they have done it, and that these forest reserves are above the timber line.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Just a moment more. My reply to that would be this: That if they have marked out as a forest reserve and now attempt to manage as a forest reserve lands upon which timber will not grow, and hence where there can be no forests, it is but another proof of the incompetency of the Interior Department to handle this question.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will state to the gentleman, in reply to that, that the very gentleman in charge of the Bureau in the Agricultural Department is the man who has laid out the most of these lands.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is true.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. If that be true, some gentleman more competent to lay out forests ought to be found than the one who lays them out on lands where there is no chance for a forest to grow. Perhaps in reserving forest slopes intervening bald knobs or mountain tops had to be taken in because they could not well be left out—intervening areas.

Mr. RODEY. There is a big one of that kind in the Territory of New Mexico.

Mr. LACEY. I ask unanimous consent that general debate be now closed; and I give notice that if that consent is given, I will move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that general debate be now closed. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LACEY. I move that the committee do now rise.

WHITE RIVER BRIDGE IN ARKANSAS.

Mr. BERRY. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 6030) authorizing the Newport Bridge, Belt and Terminal Railway Company to construct a bridge across the White River in Arkansas, to report it favorably without amendment. There are some reasons why it is important that the bill should be passed at once. I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. TURNER introduced a bill (S. 6118) to prohibit the grazing of sheep on the Rainier Forest Reserve, in the State of Washington; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. TURNER. In connection with the bill, I present a number of letters and resolutions from individuals and parties in the State of Washington affected by this matter. I move that the papers be printed as a document, and that they be referred, with the bill, to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.
